The subject is of no small importance, even as to the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, which contains large railroad mileage, and the settlement of these principles in this bill must bear upon future legislation as to mines, Government navy-yards, machine shops, and great enterprises like the Panama Canal, where tens of thousands of men, of various races and degrees of intelligence, are working together in a hostile climate. The subject is too complicated for me or anyone else to be sure that his views are right, but it is too important for any legislation to be passed which is manifestly imperfect. It is better to do nothing than to create any system where most of the money paid shall go into the profits of an insurance company or legal expenses or to pass a law which may be held unconstitutional.

II. With reference to territory not within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, and the mutual relations of employees and employers engaged in interstate commerce, I have seen no cause to change my opinion, as expressed upon the bill that was held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. I believe that the question should be left to the law of the State having jurisdiction of the employment, and that the jurisdiction of the contract of service should not be made national because the employer is engaged in interstate commerce. My opinion, as expressed then, was as follows:

"The questions as to how far employers should be liable to their employees for the acts of fellow-servants, the degree of contributory negligence on the part of the person injured that should bar a recovery, and the extent to which the contract of employment should govern, are of the utmost importance, and the considerations in favor of a relaxation of the strict rules of the common law have caused the passage and amendment of numerous State statutes, under which experience is teaching how the good of the community may be best obtained.

"But these questions should be governed by the law of the State having jurisdiction of the employment, and the jurisdiction of the contract of service should not be made national because the employer is engaged in interstate commerce. The attempt to pass such a law will cause inextricable confusion as to where the State and national law should govern, especially in the case of local employees. It will abolish the advantage of practical experience, testing the value of the various State provisions, and the plaintiff will be sent to the distant, crowded, and expensive forum of United States courts, and the cause of the employee is more likely to be hurt thereby than aided by anything contained in this bill."

I sympathize with proper expansion of the right of an employee to recover for accidents in a dangerous occupation, employing hosts of men whose negligence may cause irremediable personal injury to each other; but I think this modification of the common law should and will be provided by the various States and that this bill will be an injury to those that it attempts to benefit. It is a question whether we can legislate as to all employees, as, for example, if a couple of men are shoveling dirt into a railroad car and one happens to hit the other with a shovel. But even in the most pitiful cases of injury it will not help the parties that the railroad should have the right to remove the suit to a United States court, and thereby to take that suit to a distant court with a crowded calendar which may not be called for years. Pass this bill and it would add 20,000 cases in the United States courts and subject plaintiffs to appeals to the United States courts of appeal which, if these cases be added, might take ten years. I do not believe in that legislation which will cause this result, and I doubt also whether it be constitutional to take all questions between employer and employee away from the State.

Mr. Speaker, there is no contract, except perhaps that of marriage, which goes deeper into those personal rights of man and man which are reserved to the States than the contract of employment and the rights as between employer and employee, as well as the right of suit for personal injury caused by the negligence of another. I can not believe that it is for the benefit of the people of the United States that the jurisdiction of the States over these matters should be infringed. I doubt whether the power to regulate interstate commerce carries with it the power to change this relation between employer and employee. If it be so, and if this were the best bill in the world, the confusion that would take place on a railroad which does some of its business outside of a State and some of its business inside of a State would be inextricable. It would lead to various decisions, varying judgments, and to difficulties which would not tend to the benefit of those whom this legislation attempts to benefit. I therefore am opposed to this legislation, believing that all these questions are being worked out in the various States by various statutes; that the best statute will prove its right to remain, and that the worst will be amended so as to be like the best.

I repeat, that the attempt to pass such a law will cause inextricable confusion as to where the State and national law should govern, especially in the case of local employees. The Supreme Court in their opinion seem to limit any right to employees engaged in interstate commerce at the time of the injury, and possibly to those who are injured by other employees likewise so engaged. The opinion seems to exclude so many cases that there is almost nothing left. I quote from their decision:

"* * * Take a railroad engaged in interstate commerce, having a purely local branch operated wholly within a State. Take, again, the same road having shops for repairs, and it may be for construction work, as well as a large accounting and clerical force, and having, it may be, storage elevators and warehouses, not to suggest besides the possibility of its being engaged in other independent enterprises. Take a telegraph company engaged in the transmission of interstate and local messages. Take an express company engaged in local as well as interstate business. Take a trolley line moving wholly within a State as to a large part of its business and yet as to the remainder crossing the State line.

"As the act thus includes many subjects wholly beyond the power to regulate commerce * * *."

There can be no advantage to the employee in creating so many subjects of litigation as to where the State law should govern and where the United States law, nor in providing Federal questions in each case which will enable appeals to be taken to the United States Supreme Court. I want to aid the many thousands of honest Americans who are working upon our railroads. I think that the United States in its sphere and the various States in theirs should pass statutes granting definite relief in case of accident in such dangerous occupation as work on railroads and in mines. This bill does not cover these hazards, but only part of them. It is not confined to these hazards, but includes others, and the relief provided is not definite, but by uncertain suits on new and uncertain principles for unliquidated damages. I regret that the bill does not come into the House in proper shape. It is to be hoped that this or some measure may be so perfected in the House or in the Senate as to really meet the demands of the time.

RICHARD WAYNE PARKER.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Three minutes and a half.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield that time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this bill with some mental reservations. As I recollect now, I am the only Member of the House here who spoke and voted in the Fifty-ninth Congress against the employers' liability bill, and I had the good fortune, though without having time for reflection, to then state substantially every ground upon which that bill was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States. That is my justification for thus speaking and voting then. Now, an honest attempt has been made by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to make this bill constitutional, and I believe that the first section of the bill standing alone will be held to be constitutional. I also believe that unless the third section of the bill is amended before it becomes a law, it is baldly unconstitutional, as was the other bill, for it applies generally to injuries and requires damages against a railroad, although not suffered while the employee was engaged in interstate commerce. That, I hope, will be amended somewhere before the bill becomes a law. I also have an objection——

Mr. STERLING. Will the gentleman permit a question? Do you say you get that proposition from this bill?

Mr. KEIFER. Absolutely from this bill.

Mr. STERLING. I submit that it is not there; it is expressly limited in the words of the Supreme Court and says, "while such common carrier is engaged in interstate commerce."

Mr. KEIFER. Then the print you have is different from the print I have.

Mr. STERLING. That is in all the prints, every one that has been made, and it says that the servant of the common carrier must be injured while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce in order to entitle him to recover.

Mr. KEIFER. But the gentleman refers to section 1 of the bill. The language he has just quoted is not in section 3 of the bill. Section 3 says:

That in all actions hereafter brought against any such common carrier by railroads to recover damages for personal injuries to an employee, or where such injuries have resulted in his death, etc.

And there are no words in section 3 which relate to the injuries resulting while the common carrier is engaged in interstate commerce. Section 1 of the bill is properly limited to damages incurred by an employee while engaged in interstate commerce; not so in the section relating to contributory negligence.

Mr. STERLING. Now, will the gentleman yield to another statement?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; but my time is very short.

Mr. STERLING. The very first line says, "that every common carrier by railroad while engaged in commerce."

Mr. DIEKEMA. And then says, "such common carrier."

Mr. KEIFER. That is in section 1, but I am reading from section 3.

Mr. STERLING. It says, "such common carrier," limiting it to the same common carrier.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, if I had the time——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Perhaps the gentleman has a last year's bird's nest that is causing the trouble.

Mr. KEIFER. Well, that is a very cheap, weak thing with which to take up a Member's time when he only has about four minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Well, I take it back, then.

Mr. KEIFER. I objected before, not on constitutional grounds, to the other bill, but I criticised it because it undertook to make a law relating to actions against common carriers that applied in State courts, which would drive every one of those cases from the State courts by petitions for removal, to the Federal courts where the employees can not afford to go——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STERLING. Has the time been exhausted on both sides of the House?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. STERLING. I ask unanimous consent for leave for all Members to print on the subject-matter of this bill for three days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for leave of Members to print on the subject-matter of this bill for three days.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi objects.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

Mr. SULZER. The ayes and noes, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 302, nays 1, answered "present" 7, not voting 79, as follows:

So, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. COUSINS with Mr. HOWARD.

Mr. REYNOLDS with Mr. CLARK of Florida.

Mr. TOWNSEND with Mr. MCDERMOTT.

Mr. MCCALL with Mr. SABATH.

For the balance of the day:

Mr. GILHAMS with Mr. WILLETT.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware with Mr. HARDWICK.

Mr. PEARRE with Mr. GILL.

Mr. GRAFF with Mr. WEISSE.

Mr. COLE with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from West Virginia [Mr. HUGHES] is absent. I am informed if he was present he would vote "aye."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

RAILROAD PASSES AND FREE TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I move that the rules be suspended and that the bill S. 4260 be put upon its passage.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 4260) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved June 29, 1906.

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph 4 of section 1 of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved June 29, 1906, be amended so that said paragraph as so amended will read as follows:

"No common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall, after January 1, 1907, directly or indirectly, issue or give any interstate free ticket, free pass, or free transportation for passengers, except to its employees and their families, its officers, agents, surgeons, physicians, and attorneys at law; to ministers of religion, traveling secretaries of Railroad Young Men's Christian Associations, inmates of hospitals and charitable and eleemosynary institutions, and persons exclusively engaged in charitable and eleemosynary work; to indigent, destitute, and homeless persons, and to such persons when transported by charitable societies or hospitals, and the necessary agents employed in such transportation; to inmates of the National Homes or State Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and of Soldiers' and Sailors' Homes, including those about to enter and those returning home after discharge and boards of managers of such Homes; to necessary care takers of live stock, poultry, and fruit; to employees on sleeping cars, express cars, and to linemen of telegraph and telephone companies; to railway mail service employees, post-office inspectors, customs inspectors, and immigration inspectors; to newsboys on trains, baggage agents, witnesses attending any legal investigation in which the common carrier is interested, persons injured in wrecks and physicians and nurses attending such persons: Provided, That this provision shall not be construed to prohibit the interchange of passes for the officers, agents, and employees of common carriers, and their families; nor to prohibit any common carrier from carrying passengers free with the object of providing relief in cases of general epidemic, pestilence, or other calamitous visitations: Provided further, That the term 'employees' as used in this paragraph shall include furloughed, pensioned, and superannuated employees, persons who have become disabled or infirm in the service of any such common carrier, and the remains of a person killed in the employment of a carrier and ex-employees traveling for the purpose of entering the service of any such common carrier; and the term 'families' as used in this paragraph shall include the families of those persons named in this proviso, also the families of persons killed while in the service of any such common carrier. Any common carrier violating this provision shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and for each offense, on conviction, shall pay to the United States a penalty of not less than $100 nor more than $2,000, and any person, other than the persons excepted in this provision, who uses any such interstate free ticket, free pass, or free transportation, shall be subject to a like penalty. Jurisdiction of offenses under this provision shall be the same as that provided for offenses in an act entitled 'An act to further regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States,' approved February 19, 1903, and any amendment thereof."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, in order to have an explanation of the bill, I demand a second.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to twenty minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to amend the rate law as to the pass provision by extending somewhat the exceptions, allowing the issuance of passes to the railroad employees. The law as it now stands provides that passes may be issued by common carriers by railroad to the officers, agents, and employees of such common carriers and their families. That is the law as it stands now and has existed for more than twenty years. This measure amends that provision by adding the second proviso on page 3 of this bill, which reads as follows, and I will read the only change that this bill makes in the present law:

Provided further, That the terms "employees" as used in this paragraph shall include furloughed, pensioned, and superannuated employees, persons who have become disabled or infirm in the service of any such common carrier, and the remains of a person killed in the employment of a carrier, and ex-employees traveling for the purpose of entering the service of any such common carrier; and the term "families" as used in this paragraph shall include the families of those persons named in this proviso, also the families of persons killed while in the service of any such common carrier.

That is the only change in the existing law made by this bill. You will note that there are substantially four different classes of persons added by this provision—first, the term "employees" shall include "furloughed, pensioned, and superannuated employees." My own impression is that all those are already covered by the present law if it be fairly and liberally construed.

Mr. COX of Indiana rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield.

Mr. COX of Indiana. The railroad men in my district, I may state, have been requesting that this law be amended along this line to permit employees who are really out of a job, or work——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will come to that in a moment, if the gentleman will just allow me.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Very well.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The first provision, as I said, covers furloughed, pensioned, and superannuated employees, which, I think, is covered by the present law. The second provision is for persons who have become disabled or infirm in the service of any such common carrier. My own impression is that this class also might be covered by a liberal construction of the present law; but this line makes certain what before was doubtful. The third provision is as to the "remains of a person killed in the employment of a common carrier." That is not covered by existing law, and no one can doubt that it ought to be. There needs to be no further argument on that proposition. Now, the fourth provision is the one mentioned by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox], namely, "ex-employees traveling for the purpose of entering the service of any such common carrier."

The reason for that is this: In different sections of the country there is a much larger business at one time of the year than in another. For example, in the Southwest men may be employed in the spring or in the late fall, and out of employment in the middle of the summer, and the railroad men would then travel from the Southwest to the Northwest and the Northeast, where they could find ample employment during the summer. This is desirable for the men themselves. It is also desirable for the railroads. It is desirable for the localities in which those railroads operate, because it enables those roads to give the best possible service to the public.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The provision the gentleman is now discussing, I understand, is limited to ex-employees of the road or the carrier that is authorized to give the pass. Would not that be the construction? What I would like to know is, if an ex-employee of another common carrier could receive a pass in going to seek employment from a road he never has worked upon—a carrier he has never worked for?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, of course the word "ex-employees," in line 13 of the bill, is not particularly limited except as it may refer to the word "employees," in line 3 of the bill. Now, a practical construction of that would be that the railroad would only issue passes to any railroad employees upon a card or certificate that would satisfactorily show that these men were such employees. In practice this is always carefully guarded both by the carriers and by the railroad men themselves. Now, whether or not it would be confined to employees of the railroad issuing the pass, I confess that I have some doubt; but there would be required a satisfactory identification of the man as being an ex-employee of a common carrier to entitle him to have any courtesy from the initial carrier.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. In my judgment the Interstate Commerce Commission, and perhaps the courts, would limit the issue of passes under that provision to ex-employees of the carrier that proposed to issue the pass.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The only limitation would be by construing it in connection with the words "employees of common carriers," in line 3, and that is not clear as to whether the employees outside of the carrier issuing the pass would be included.

Mr. PADGETT. May I ask the gentleman a question about line 13, where it says "for the purpose of entering the service of such common carrier?" Does not the word "such" limit it?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It limits it to the common carriers described in this bill—railroads, not steamboats or stagecoaches.

Mr. PADGETT. Would it not have a tendency to limit it to the common carrier issuing the pass?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; I think not, Mr. Speaker. My own impression is that it would not work that way. My own impression is that it would work this way: That a railroad man, being an ex-employee, an engineer, who desired employment, applying to a Southwestern road, seeking to go to the Northeast, belonging to some railroad organization or some employment agency of them, and being identified by some of the known employees as in the former service of some carrier by those who knew him, who would personally identify him before an officer of the company, that he would then be given the courtesy provided by this amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman will allow me to state a case, I will ask him whether the bill covers it? It is common for all railroads who have to let contracts for the building of bridges, and perhaps other structures, for the contractor who hires his people to do his work and his machinery—part of it heavy—to have it carried out to the place. Now, does the bill allow the railroad to carry the employees of the contractor who is going to perform that work on their own line of road?

Mr. MANN. That is now authorized by a ruling of the Commission.

Mr. KEIFER. It is not authorized under the former law, because I had a case arising in my own State where the contractor hired his people and took them to Cincinnati, and paid their fare, and they ran away after they had gone down there, and he had to go elsewhere to get more people.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think they have changed their ruling on that subject. That would not be covered by this amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. Well, it ought to be covered by it.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to ask this question: Suppose a man who had been an employee, say, of the New York Central Railroad, who has become superannuated and is a pensioned employee. Under the provisions of the bill, could he receive a pass from the New York Central? Suppose he wanted to go from Albany to Chicago, could he also receive a pass over the Lake Shore Road, or would this apply only to the company of which he was a superannuated employee?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The present provision only covers an issue of the pass on the line to whom the application is made. But there is a provision of the act of 1887 which allows an interchange of passes, which has never been changed by any subsequent legislation.

Mr. PERKINS. So that would cover such a case.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That would cover that case.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I desire to ask the gentleman a question simply for information. I am for his bill and the amendment as presented here. Is it the judgment of the committee that it must be either an employee or ex-employee, or would it be broad enough to allow the issuing of a pass to one who is seeking employment?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No. This is very clear. The man must either have had previous employment or be an ex-employee of the common carrier, coming under the provisions of this general bill. Now, Mr. Speaker, these four classes——

Mr. MONDELL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. I should like to know whether the Committee discussed the advisability of allowing passes to be given to employees of contractors of a railroad company to a work going to be carried on, along the line of the inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; we did discuss that, and we discussed a good many other propositions in connection with the pass provision, but we did not think, on the whole, that it was wise to amend the bill as it stands now.

Mr. MONDELL. My understanding is that the railroad companies desire to have authority to carry the employees of those with whom they make contracts for construction and repairs. Is that not true?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes, there is no question about the advisability of it from their standpoint.

Mr. MONDELL. What objection would there seem to be to legislation of that character?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. We did not care to extend these exceptions to the pass law any further than was necessary right now, and as I have said, practically the only extension of this bill is the one that I have just gone over. That is the real substance of this bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And their families go, too.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. KEIFER. This is the Senate bill.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; this is the Senate bill.

Mr. KEIFER. We have not amended it at all.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] asks if the families go, too, and I say, yes. The remaining four lines of the amendment cover the families of these various classes that I have named, as well as the families of persons killed while in the service. Up to this time the families of killed employees were obliged to pay fare, and we thought it only an act of common humanity to allow them to be carried free under this provision.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HACKNEY.]

Mr. HACKNEY. Mr. Speaker, I will address myself to the paragraph that is found on page 3, lines 15, 16, and 17. I very much regret that this bill does not go further in extending the benefits to the families of deceased employees. It does go to the extent of allowing transportation to be issued to the families of those persons who are killed in the service, but I presume almost every Member on the floor of this House has in mind some instance where a man has given his life to the service of a railroad company in some capacity that did not necessarily draw him onto the road all of his time whose death was not caused by any casualty, and at the end of his life has left his family practically helpless, and the widow and the minor children are at present barred from the benefits of this privilege.

At the opening of this Congress I introduced a bill to extend the exemption to the widow during her widowhood and to the minor children of any deceased employee. It seems to me that provision ought to have been engrafted in this bill, and I should like to request unanimous consent now to add an amendment of that kind to this bill. Of course I recognize that it can not be done except by unanimous consent.

In my own district I know of three cases, one particularly of a division superintendent who gave his life to the service of the railroad company, who left his family helpless, and his widow, who had been in the habit of going over the line the greater part of her married life, is unable to go with her little children on the road now without paying fare. The sentiment there in that community is very much in favor of the amendment I suggest. I would not vote against this bill, because I believe it goes far to meet cases that address themselves to the favorable consideration of this legislative body in every section of the country, but I regret that I can not get the provision extended in the direction I suggest. I now renew the request that I be allowed to offer that amendment, to extend this proviso by adding, after the word "carrier," in lines 16 and 17, the words "and the widow during widowhood, and minor children of any deceased employee of such carrier."

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I very much regret that I must object, but the committee does not think it wise that this bill should be amended.

The SPEAKER. What was the request of the gentleman?

Mr. HACKNEY. A request for unanimous consent to amend the bill; and the gentleman from Minnesota has said he could not consent to it. I am not quarreling with the gentleman, but I regret that he can not see his way clear to go to that extent. I think the bill is good as far as it goes. I favor it for what it does, but I regret that we can not go a little further.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, as well as the other Members of the House and Senate, are constantly besieged with propositions to change the existing pass prohibition in the rate law. Up to the present time neither the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate nor the committee of the House having jurisdiction have been willing to make any report upon any bill which will change the existing provisions, except the bill now before the House.

When the rate law went into effect containing the prohibition against granting passes, it was the expectation that the railroad employees, themselves dependent upon the railroads for their livelihood, might properly be granted free transportation. It was not one of these cases where the railroads grant something to somebody entirely disconnected with the railroad service, but is something in the way of compensation given by the railroad to the employee.

The pending bill, including the item which has been explained so well by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], has been prepared and presented by the railroad employees in the country. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HACKNEY] thought that something ought to be added. In my judgment, the provision which he refers to is now in the bill, but if it be not in the bill, then the bill as it stands is asked for by the railroad employees. After this bill had passed the Senate the gentleman representing the Conductors' Association and gentlemen representing other associations appeared before our committee and there, so far as they were concerned, asked that this bill might be reported and passed as it now stands, without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i."

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Suppose an ex-employee starts from New York to San Francisco in the West seeking employment; does the gentleman believe that this bill is broad enough to allow the road to issue a pass to him?

Mr. MANN. I do not know. I have read the section in the bill three or four times and I do not know. It is like all legislation prepared outside of this body. I do not know. I shall vote for the bill on the same theory that I voted for the employers' liability bill—nobody knows whether it is constitutional or not. I doubt if anybody can read the employers' liability bill and tell what it means. I am sure nobody can tell exactly what this means, but in the main it covers the question. It is in the form that the gentlemen asked for it. If this be enacted into law it covers almost every case that can arise. If it shall be construed that it does not cover the case referred to by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] and Congress wishes to cover it, it can be done hereafter.

I have been in this body too long to believe that it is possible to enact perfect legislation. I have never seen a bill passed here that did not require construction, amendment, or repeal, and I never expect to. Now, we have not gone outside of the question of employees and their families. There are other classes that properly might be granted passes and exchange of service. These matters are still under consideration by the committee, but in view of the attitude of the Interstate Commerce Commission, properly enough, in construing the law, we thought that the railroad companies might be permitted as a part of the compensation to grant passes to their employees and their families.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In the original act does there appear the word "agents," in line 7, page 2?

Mr. MANN. There is no change in the law whatever in this bill except the insertion, on page 3, of the proviso beginning on line 7, down to the word "carrier," in lines 16 and 17. That is added to the law, but there is no other change in the law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It says "attorneys at law." It does not say the road's attorneys.

Mr. MANN. That is existing law. We have not amended that provision in regard to anybody except certain classes of railroad employees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, so far this day has been given, and wisely given, to legislation touching the status of railroad employees of the country. It is to me a matter of extreme regret that bills as important as the one just preceding this should have been considered under a suspension of the rules when debate was limited to twenty minutes on a side and no amendment was in order.

Somewhat of what the gentleman from Illinois has stated, I agree to. Some of it, however, I agree to not as a necessary condition of legislation in Congress, but as a present condition brought about by the way we do legislate, not by the way we ought to or have to legislate. I should like to have called attention in the consideration of the previous bill to the fact that it does not deal, except in a very limited way, with one of the most iniquitous legal rules which, while logical from the standpoint of the logician, is brutal from the standpoint of the humanitarian, and that is the doctrine of assumed risk.

We have just passed a law which provides that the employee shall not be held to have assumed a risk relative to any matter where a statute requires the railroad to do some special thing looking to the safety of employees, but it leaves in full force and effect the doctrine of assumed risk as to other matters not covered by statute. Let me illustrate how harsh that rule is by citing a leading case in Kentucky. The case was that of an Irishman who was working on the stonework of a bridge over the Ohio River. He was wheeling in a wheelbarrow stone over a narrow plank walk one or two feet wide. He went to his boss and said to him, "This is a dangerous plank, a man is liable to be overweighted and thrown into the river and drowned." The boss answered him, "If you don't like your job, you can quit." He went back to work. Within a few hours what he had predicted did happen. The stone overweighted him and he was thrown into the river below and drowned. Upon suit being brought the court held, and rightly held according to that rule, that he had assumed the risk and that his personal representative could not recover. That is good law, but it is barbarous justice. [Applause.] I would like to have seen the employers' liability bill do away with such a rule. I would like to have seen the proper discussion of one of the phrases in the first paragraph of that bill. I do not believe that we are so cramped for time that we can not afford to give a proper consideration to important matters. If we had properly considered the employers' liability bill in the first instance, we would never have had to repass it now. If we had not waited three months since the decision of the Supreme Court before we have a bill presented to us for consideration now, we would not have to put it through under suspension of rules. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I could not let the opportunity pass without making my protest against the unnecessary way that we are legislating upon important matters. I had rather Congress would pass two or three bills that constitute a real equity, that reform a real evil, fully, completely, and constitutionally, than that we should try to humbug the public and the voters by passing through half-baked, undigested legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RANDELL].

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my voice to the protest against passing legislation like this bill in the manner in which it is being passed. There is no opportunity to amend it. It must be rushed through in this manner because the Republican management in this House says it must be done, with only twenty minutes to discuss it and no opportunity to improve it. In reference to the granting of passes prohibited in this bill, the guilty party is denounced and punished by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $2,000. But the same penalty that would be applied to the railroad company is applied to the party who takes the pass—a very unequal penalty, when you consider the situation—the ability of the parties to pay. It may force the man that rides upon the pass to go to jail. The railroad company would not feel the amount of the fine. It ought, in addition, to provide that, if the violation is willful, the party guilty of issuing the pass should be sent to jail and the penalty for the one receiving the pass ought to be less than is prescribed in this bill. Of course the punishment of those receiving passes protects the railroad company against the information being given against it, because no man will admit that he received or used any such pass, and the guilty companies will escape for lack of evidence. Again, this bill provides that attorneys of the railroad companies can receive passes, can receive the advantages prohibited by other people by the provisions of this bill. Therefore a Member of Congress can simply be an attorney for a railroad and he can have his passes the same as he used to. The Republican party in this House has made a party issue, that a law denouncing the employment of Members of Congress by public-service companies shall not be enacted. You propose to hold that privilege, and now you give yourselves, you that are the representatives of these corporations, the privilege of riding on passes without violating this law. It ought not to be. It is contrary to the principle and spirit of such legislation. It is unfair to the people; it is wrong in its tendency. It ought to be stated in this bill that a Member of Congress riding upon a pass, receiving one in violation of this law, would be subject to penalty, not only of a fine, but by imprisonment, and be deprived of the right to hold office. Such an amendment you would vote down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HACKETT].

Mr. HACKETT. Mr. Speaker, representing, as I do, a large constituency of railroad employees, I desire to add my voice and vote in advocacy of the bill providing for free transportation to railroad employees and their families. As I nuderstand it, this is a bill prepared by the representatives of the railroad employees and of the various organizations and unions with which they have allied themselves, and these men, together with those who represent their interests on this floor and in the Senate of the United States, have among them men of such a high class of ability and probity that they undoubtedly could draft and have drafted a bill which will meet their necessities and give them the well-merited relief. They are asking Congress that this legislation be not delayed. They request that this bill be passed by the House of Representatives immediately, as it has been by the Senate, without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," in order that they may have the benefit of the privileges therein contained at once. Mr. Speaker, I favor this course. I am desirous that the railroad employees may know to-morrow that the Congress of the United States realizes the position in which they have been placed by former legislation and stands ready to correct it, so that the railroads may be permitted to give these employees and their families free transportation in the broadest sense, as provided for in this bill.

In view of the fact that, by reason of a Republican panic and the hard times caused thereby, there are now within the United States over 250,000 ex-railroad employees out of a job, without means to support themselves and their families, I especially favor that clause in the bill which permits free transportation to any ex-employee and his family, traveling for the purpose of entering the service of any common carrier, wherever he may be able to find a position. The men at the throttle who, with watchful eyes, fearless hearts, and steady nerves, hold the lives of millions in their safe-keeping, as the vast engines go racing across the country, freighted with their burdens of humanity; the telegraph operators, whose quick ears catch the movements of the swiftly running trains and guide them safely on their way; the mechanics and laborers in the shops, whose skilled training enables them to detect the slightest defect in the machinery and groom the iron horse for another race; the kind-hearted and polite conductors and agents, and all the vast army of railway employees, whose lives are lived in furthering the great transportation facilities of the country and in serving the public equally as well as their employers, deserve the best that their Representatives and Senators in Congress can give them, and I hope this bill will pass without a dissenting vote, so that when the well-earned vacation comes, they can go whithersoever their minds may lead them, whether to the old homestead, or the pleasure resort, carrying their families with them free of cost, thus giving them rest and recreation amid the most pleasant surroundings and enabling them to return to their labors with renewed strength and rejuvenated hearts. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, in the one minute of time left to me I desire merely to say I am very much in favor of the passage of this bill. I can not quite altogether agree with my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] when he said that he never saw a bill pass, and never expected to see one pass, that would not have to be either amended or revised later on——

Mr. MANN. Or construed, I said.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or construed. I think that a bill of just one section repealing the duty on wood pulp, if passed to-morrow, would never have to be construed, or amended, or revised.

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman has never seen it passed.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Seven minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I do not complain of the committee coming in here through one of its members and moving to suspend the rules and passing this bill. It is a good one, but falls a little short of perfection. It ought to have provided for the carriage free of employees who go upon the lines of railroads for the purpose of doing work for a contract or in building bridges or other structures, but this could not be now done. I agree with my friend from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] that we ought to be more deliberate in passing bills, but he will see, and I hope agrees with me, that so long as Members on that side of the House take up a great deal of our time in calling the roll after 5 o'clock or 6 o'clock to adjourn and otherwise bother us with calls all the time unless they are permitted to select the kind of bills they want, and therefore we are obliged to resort to just this kind of legislation we are now voting for.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How much time was wasted in the committee in getting these two bills into the House?

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, every Member of any intelligence at all on this floor learned long since that the employers' liability bill was to be submitted this day in the House, and they occupied hours and hours of time calling the roll last week for the purpose of forcing us to bring this bill up now the very time it was known it was to come up.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is not the only bill we want to bring up.

Mr. KEIFER. Well, the other bills stand in the same relation, I agree with my friend from Kentucky——

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman from Kentucky does not agree with his friend from Ohio——

Mr. KEIFER. I have no time to yield.

Mr. SHERLEY. You can either yield or decline to yield. Do not you know that bringing this bill up under suspension of the rules necessarily limits both debate and the power to amend?

Mr. KEIFER. Both debate and power to amend, but we are obliged to hasten our legislation——

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the gentleman know it is child's talk now about our saving time——

Mr. KEIFER. Because you have forced us to spend about a week calling the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I had rather see you get them through by suspension than not get them through at all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, there has been some criticism that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was not diligent in reporting this bill. It passed the Senate on the 13th day of February, and it was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on the 14th day of February. Hearings were had on it about the 12th of March, in due course. The committee and the House are familiar with the fact that there are about 100 bills on the Calendar of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce introduced by Members, and every Member has been interested in his bill, and every Member who desired has had a hearing on his bill, and it does not lie in the mouths of Members on either side of this House to rebuke the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for not properly reporting this legislation. We did give hearings, and have acted with more than due diligence, considering the pressure upon us by the Members of this House. We did report it on the 2d day of April. We have brought it before this House at the first opportunity. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is one thing——

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. May I interrupt the gentleman just a moment?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield to my colleague from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I want the gentleman to state whether there has been any opposition from anybody on that committee to this bill.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I am glad the gentleman from Georgia made that statement. Every member on the committee favored this bill, every member voted for it and expedited its consideration, and we have had the satisfaction this day of bringing it up by unanimous consent with the evident approval of every Member of the House.

Mr. HARDY. I would like to ask the gentleman, inasmuch as there is a controversy here as to whether Members of Congress might, under this bill, accept free passes, we might not, by unanimous consent, add to this bill, "who shall not be judicial or legislative officers of the United States or of any State of the United States."

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I could not, under instructions from the committee, yield unanimous consent for any amendment to this bill. What the gentleman desires is prohibited now. This bill is only designed to cover one particular thing, to extend the construction of the word "employee," and that is the only object to be desired. It is the only thing that ought to be legislated by this bill. It was for that purpose only that this bill was prepared and has been given consideration.

Mr. HARDY. What I wanted to ask the gentleman was, Does not the bill as it is now really amend the current law so as to let in exceptions to the antifree-pass law, in the nature of attorneys and Members of Congress, that the present law would not permit?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Not at all. It only covers a certain class of employees really seeking jobs, the bodies of their dead, and their families. That is the only object of this bill. It is the only provision which is covered by it. There ought to be no pass legislation extending the provisions of the present law unless it is clearly in the public interest. Pass legislation ought not to make special classes or separate classes of our people unless it is clearly for the public interest and for the broadest public welfare.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No class of people ought to seek or be permitted to have special privileges like these unless it is clearly evident that the general good is promoted by means of such legislation. It is for the advantage of the public, for the advantage of those running the railroads, that these men and their families should be carried as may be necessary. That it helps the favored individual goes without saying; but beyond that it is a very great convenience to the carriers, and more than all, promotes the public interest by supplying needed and timely labor, distributes it easily and without friction, assists in moving our products, and generally contributes to the public welfare. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Under the language on page 2, line 8, "attorneys at law," does not that permit any attorney——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; Mr. Speaker, it has been settled that it is only the attorneys of the railroad companies, and actually engaged at the time in railroad employment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is a repetition of the existing law?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly. It is the law as it has stood for over twenty years, and is subject to well-known construction and application. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TAWNEY in the chair). The question is, Shall the rules be suspended and the bill be passed?

The question was taken, and in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

NAVAL STATION AT PEARL HARBOR.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the rules be suspended and the bill H. R. 20308, a bill to establish a naval station at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, be passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill, which the Clerk will report.

A bill (H. R. 20308) to establish a naval station at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to establish a naval station at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, on the site heretofore acquired for that purpose; and to erect thereat all the necessary machine shops, storehouses, coal sheds, and other necessary buildings, at an aggregate cost of not to exceed $500,000, and to build thereat one graving dry dock capable of receiving the largest war vessels of the Navy, at a cost not to exceed $2,000,000.

SEC. 2. That the sums hereinafter stated are hereby appropriated and made immediately available, to be expended at the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, to wit: Toward dredging an entrance channel of a depth of 35 feet, $200,000; toward construction of dry dock, $300,000; toward erecting machine shops, storehouses, coal sheds, and other necessary buildings, $100,000; toward yard development, $50,000; in all, $650,000.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Navy may, in his discretion, enter into contracts for any portion of the work, including material therefor, within the respective limits of cost herein stipulated, subject to appropriations to be made therefor by Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it proper to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] if he is against the bill?

Mr. PADGETT. I am not.

The SPEAKER. Or the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] if he is against the bill?

Mr. PADGETT. I am a member of the committee, and ask for a second in order to have debate upon the matter.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] against the bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman from Mississippi was not against the bill some time ago.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that if anybody is against the bill and desires to be recognized, he should be recognized to control the time. Does any gentleman desire to be recognized in opposition to the bill? [After a pause.] In the absence of that the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT].

Mr. BATES. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] is the ranking minority member of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Precisely. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BATES] is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] to twenty minutes.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, this bill is a complete authorization and partial appropriation for the establishment of a naval station at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the people of this country fully realize at this time the necessity of not only strengthening and confirming our hold upon the Hawaiian Islands, but also that we should make them the means of protection for the whole Pacific coast against any possible enemy in the Far East. The Hawaiian Islands afford the only possible base for a naval station for a distance of 4,000 miles from the Pacific coast. They are located at a distance of 2,100 miles, a little south of west of San Francisco, in an ideal climate, and presenting a splendid harbor for fortifications and naval base. For the past sixty-five years this position has been officially recommended to the United States Government for a fitting naval station and military and naval outpost of the United States.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BATES. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Can the gentleman state to the House whether prior to this year the Navy Department has ever made any specific recommendation in regard to the establishment of a naval station at Pearl Harbor?

Mr. BATES. I think not. I never heard of any specific recommendation; but this year the President of the United States, the joint committees of defense for both the Army and Navy, and the unanimous vote of the Naval Affairs Committee present and recommend this bill for the consideration of the House and Senate. I was speaking chronologically of the presentation of this matter to the United States Government. Some twenty-two years ago, by a treaty with King Kalakaua, we acquired the right to a naval base. After the annexation of the islands and they became an organized Territory of the United States we acquired some 600 acres of land for a naval base and for fortifications. We have owned the islands absolutely for ten years, Mr. Speaker, and they are as much a part of the United States as is the Territory of Arizona or the Territory of New Mexico, having complete Territorial government and a full allegiance to the United States of America, of which they are an integral part; and about the time they became an organized Territory of the United States we acquired 600 acres of land in this harbor for the purpose of coast defense and a naval base, for machine shops and a dry dock and the facilities for repairing and coaling vessels of the United States.

The bill proposes, Mr. Speaker, that we take the final step to render this an outpost of the Pacific, for these islands are not only crossroads, but the key to the whole Pacific Ocean. This bill proposes that we should take advantage of the splendid opportunity afforded us of not only strengthening and confirming our grasp upon the Hawaiian Islands and keeping them forever from falling into the hands of any possible maritime enemy, but also to insure against and to possibly prevent any war with any countries in the Far East.

I now, Mr. Speaker, yield three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, as one of the Representatives from one of the Pacific coast States, I desire to congratulate the Committee on Naval Affairs on having reported this bill. We on the coast feel that the proper fortification of Pearl Harbor and the establishment of a naval station there renders us practically safe from foreign attack. The islands are about 2,500 miles from San Francisco. It is improbable that any foreign foe, unless they held these islands, could ever make a successful attack upon the cities of the Pacific coast, for in order to do so they would have to either carry great numbers of colliers or they would have to travel from 6,000 to 8,000 miles in order to replenish their coal supply and go back again to the attack on the cities of the coast. According to the best naval authorities that is practically an impossibility.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Does the gentleman believe that the establishment of a naval station at Pearl Harbor would render unnecessary further fortification on the Pacific coast?

Mr. KAHN. Not at all. I think that the fortification of the Pacific coast ports should still be continued.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The gentleman undoubtedly is aware of the agreement reached at The Hague recently, according to which no unfortified city, town, village, place, or building can be bombarded in the future by an enemy, and consequently will be absolutely immune if not fully fortified?

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from California permit me at this place to state to the gentleman from Missouri that it is not the result of any action of The Hague conference, but it is a principle of international law recognized by all countries.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Not at all.

Mr. KAHN. In addition to that, I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri that all these international agreements only last so long as it is to the interest of the parties to the agreement to adhere to them. They are frequently abrogated. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Until repealed by all of the parties to the agreement.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no; by force of arms. In the world's history treaty after treaty has been broken when it has become convenient for one or the other of the high contracting powers to break it.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, there is an old saying that "it is better late than never." What is being done by this bill ought to have been done nine or ten years ago. The argument with which the advocates of the annexation of the Sandwich Islands overrode all opposition in this House in 1898 was that we needed Pearl Harbor in our business; that by the expenditure of a reasonable amount of money it could be made stronger than Gibraltar; that the Sandwich Islands are the key to the Pacific. If those propositions were true then, they are true now. I voted against the annexation of the Sandwich Islands, and did everything on earth I knew how to defeat that measure, and if we had it to do over again I would do the same. But that is not the question at the present time. We have the Sandwich Islands, and it is violating no sort of confidence to say that the chances are we will have them when Gabriel blows his trumpet, unless somebody takes them away from us, which is not very probable. [Applause.] Yet, having annexed them because it was believed we needed them, ten years have elapsed without much being done to make another Gibraltar of Pearl Harbor—a fact which I have urged upon the House from year to year during the last decade. I believe one of two things is true—that we will have a naval base at Pearl Harbor or somebody else will have it there. That being the case, I am in favor of a bill like this, or this bill. I have been in favor of it ever since we annexed those islands. I do not know whether it carries enough money or too much money or too little money. I do not pretend to know anything about engineering. I never saw Pearl Harbor. But engineers say, and those who have been there say, that it is easily susceptible of being made one of the strongest places for a naval base on the face of the globe. That being the case, while we are at peace with all the world we had better place it in such impregnable condition that we will remain at peace with certain people that live over on the other side of the world—nameless here for evermore. I am glad that the Congress is waking upon this subject at last. It is much easier to retain Pearl Harbor by fortifying it adequately than to regain it should anybody take it from us because we have not fortified it. It's another case where an ounce of preventive is worth a pound of cure.

That is all I have to say about it one way or the other. Nearly every American citizen will indorse the proposition of making at Pearl Harbor a naval station and a naval base as strong as it can be made and as speedily as it can be done. [Applause.]

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, I now ask the minority member of the committee [Mr. PADGETT] to use a portion of his time, and I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to consume any time personally. The committee considered this very carefully. To look at the map is a demonstration of the need of it and the wisdom of it, and that is all I want to say about it. The committee are unanimous in favor of it. I now yield four minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the Committee on Naval Affairs on reporting this bill for the establishment of a naval station at Pearl Harbor on the island of Oahu in the Hawaiian Islands. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], who, I distinctly remember, opposed very bitterly the annexation of the Sandwich Islands, complains now that this work ought to have been done long ago, and I heartily concur with him in that complaint. But I want to call his attention and the attention of the House to the fact that, although we have had Pearl Harbor ever since 1884, twenty-four years, the Navy Department has never recommended to the Congress of the United States the establishment of a naval base at Pearl Harbor.

Notwithstanding this fact, Mr. Speaker, Congress has appropriated for the defense of this harbor, and for the defense of Honolulu, in the neighborhood of $3,000,000, and it is a matter of exceeding gratification to me to know that we are at last to begin the work of establishing a naval base on the islands of Hawaii, the buttress of the Pacific coast. When this is fully completed and fortified there will be no longer any necessity for the fortification of the Pacific coast. The fortification of Hawaii and the establishment of a naval base there is the best fortification for the Pacific coast that it can possibly have, because there is no naval vessel afloat to-day that can sail from any oriental country to the Pacific coast and return again with its own coal.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman says there will be no necessity for fortifying any mainland ports in case this bill goes through. I want to call his attention to the fact that England is in alliance with Japan. Suppose England with Japan got into a war which would involve this country, and suppose the naval station of Great Britain at Esquimault were to be used as a base to send British ships against our ports on the Pacific coast, does not the gentleman think that those ports would have to be fortified?

Mr. TAWNEY. Suppose the world should come to an end to-morrow. There would be no need of fortifying any ports, and one supposition is just as likely to happen as the other. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I say although it is a matter of gratification that we are about to begin the work, it is a matter of regret that we are not beginning the work on more intelligent, specific estimates for the work than has been presented to this House. After careful investigation I was unable to find that the Department had even submitted any estimate. This movement for the establishment of this base originates with the House of Representatives, with the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I commend the committee for its action. When this naval base is established, equipped, and fortified as proposed no power on earth can successfully attack that part of our coast that is washed by the surf billows of the Pacific. [Applause.]

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, this is a most important matter to the people of the country, and I hope the bill will pass. In 1898 I was one of the few Democrats that advocated on the floor of this House the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands. I then pointed out their strategic importance and suggested that we should own them and establish a strong naval base at Pearl Harbor. The situation of the island makes them the key to the Pacific—the door to the Orient—and the establishment of a strong naval base there will accomplish more in the interest of the peace and the commerce of the United States than any other single thing that can be devised to-day, in my opinion.

Now, sir, when the question of the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands was before this House on the 14th day of June, 1898, I said, among other things:

"In my judgment the Hawaiian Islands are the key to the Pacific and are, and of right ought to be, a part of the sovereign territory of the United States. Their acquisition is absolutely necessary for the protection of our great Pacific coast. They constitute the sentinel of the North Pacific and to us a Gibraltar indispensable to the protection of our Pacific interests. All our great naval and military authorities say this, and there can be no doubt about it in the opinion of any person who will give the question investigation. Our possession of these islands will give us a strategical position in the Pacific that will always be of incomparable advantage to us in case of trouble. The question of the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands is one in which I have taken a very deep interest, and I have given some study and some thought to the matter. For many years I have been a consistent and ardent advocate of the annexation of these Pacific islands. They should have been annexed long ago. There is no good reason why they should not be annexed now; and I congratulate this House and the country upon the fact that they soon will be annexed, forever to remain under the American flag.

"All the military and naval authorities in this country are of the same opinion, and have always been in accord on this subject. To my mind it seems apparent that we must annex these islands as a protection, from a military and naval standpoint, to our Pacific coast. We must hold and govern them for our own preservation. No halfway measures will suffice. The Government must take these islands or else some other great nation will do it.

"Let me say to the business men of America, look to the land of the setting sun, look to the Pacific! There are teeming millions there who will ere long want to be fed and clothed the same as we are. There is the great market that the continental powers are to-day struggling for. We must not be distanced in the race for the commerce of the world. In my judgment, during the next hundred years the great volume of trade and commerce, so far as this country is concerned, will not be eastward, but will be westward; will not be across the Atlantic, but will be across the broad Pacific. The Hawaiian Islands will be the key that will unlock to us the commerce of the Orient and, in a commercial sense, make us rich and prosperous.

"I shall cast my vote in favor of the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands, because we need them as a naval and military necessity now and in the future for the purpose of protecting and defending the territory which we already own. We need the Hawaiian Islands for national defense. They are the key to the Pacific, and the only coaling station in the Pacific between the Arctic Ocean and the Equator, between the continent of Asia and the coast of North America. Not to annex them now would be national folly; to annex them, security, peace, and national insurance."

Mr. Speaker, that is what I said when the question was before this House as to whether or not we should annex the Hawaiian Islands. Time has justified all that I said then. Every prediction I made in that speech in 1898 has come true, or will come true, before this century ends. To-day I want to say—and I regret that my time is so limited—that we not only need a strong naval base at Pearl Harbor, in the Hawaiian Islands, but I agree with the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] that we need all the protection that the engineering ingenuity of our military and naval experts can invent for the protection of our great Pacific coast.

We do not want war. We want peace. And the best way to command peace—and lasting peace—is by being prepared for war. We need strong military fortifications and naval bases for protection on the Pacific as well as on the Atlantic. I deprecate the narrow view some of my friends take in regard to this great question of coast defense. I believe in so far as possible all of our great coast line should be protected, and it is just as important to me whether it is on the Atlantic or on the Pacific. We need a strong military and naval base in the neighborhood of San Francisco. We need a naval and military base on Puget Sound. And we should have a strong naval base in the neighborhood of Cordova Bay, in southeastern Alaska. Those who are familiar with our great interests on the Pacific coast know this, and I know whereof I speak. The Pacific will be the theater of the world's events for this century as the Atlantic was during the last century. If anything should happen to our North Pacific fleet, it would have to go for safety and repair to the Hawaiian Islands, or to San Francisco, or to Puget Sound, or to some place in southeastern Alaska. If the American battle ships were crippled in the North Pacific there is no place at present where they could go for shelter and protection and repair unless they could make Pearl Harbor or Puget Sound or San Francisco.

The loss if they could not make one of these ports would be incalculable. A decisive defeat on the Pacific might settle our destiny for years to come. We need a naval base in southeastern Alaska. It has every advantage. In Cordova Bay our entire fleet could ride at anchor and defy the squadrons of the world. It is a natural harbor well suited for a naval base, and sooner or later we will be compelled to establish one there. In northern Pacific waters there is no place now where our fleet in case of necessity could go and be protected. In southeastern Alaska there are several places that would be advantageous for the building of a great naval base, and the Government should build one there as well as in the Hawaiian Islands. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, it has been a long time since this Congress has considered a more important matter than the one now before the House. If a great navy is important to the people of this Republic the improvement of Pearl Harbor is of great importance. If we shall have need for a navy or an important naval base within the lifetime of those now living it will be in the waters of the Pacific. The enemy that shall come against the United States shall come from the Orient. We are at peace with the world to-day. There is no probability that we shall ever have war with any nation on our Atlantic side.

We sustain commercial relations with all European countries that makes it highly improbable that these relations shall be broken by war. So I say, therefore, that if a navy is important to the United States, a naval station 2,200 miles out from the Pacific coast is important to the people of the mainland as well as to that part of the people of the United States who live on the Hawaiian Islands. No people of this country are more loyal or patriotic than those citizens who live under the Stars and Stripes in the islands of Hawaii. [Applause.]

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I now yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] a member of the committee.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I expect to see Pearl Harbor, if I live to the average span of human life, not only the greatest naval station in the Pacific Ocean, but the greatest naval station in the world; not only the greatest station of to-day, but the greatest station of all time. I make the statement because I see that that harbor in Oahu presents the one combination of physical conditions that makes a great naval station possible within a radius of 2,500 miles on the Pacific Ocean as a center. It makes it thus not only an outpost for America, but the outpost for the white man. The annihilation of space has suddenly brought all nations and all races together. There must be worked out some basis upon which these nations and these races can live together in peace. The change is sudden. Before this, nations have believed that they lived as natural enemies, according to the law of nature, where one survives by the destruction of the other.

I believe that the same cause that brought about the annihilation of space that has given man control of nature's forces has put him above the great law of destroying his own kind. I believe that man is now finding out that he does not have to destroy his kind in order to live; that the test for survival, in other words, is not might and brute force to destroy, but is the capacity and the willingness to cooperate and serve to control nature's great forces for the common good. The effect of the annihilation of space has been primarily to cause the nations of the earth to leap to arms. We are now in a transition period, a very critical period. All nations realize that those other nations they have regarded as their enemies are at their very doors. I believe, however, that in the progress of civilization the great nations of the white race have come to realize that they can find a basis upon which they can live in peace. I believe the fact that Germans and French, that English and Dutch, that all the peoples of the earth that hate each other there in their old habitats have come together and mingled their blood in America in a perfect reconciliation, and the fact that here with such a reconciliation we have built up a mighty system, combining the great principle of local self-government with the principle of joint and just cooperation in a common government—I believe that these are leading the white race rapidly to the point where the nations will evolve an international organization that will be adequate for the purposes of peace in the world. But we must not ignore the fact that this same annihilation of space has also brought the white race and the yellow race together. Every page of the world's history shows that when races so far apart, that they are different in color, have met each other, they have invariably met in war, war to extermination. I will not follow these cases in history, but will simply point out that there has never been one exception, and right under our own eyes we have seen a recent instance in the meeting of the Japanese and the Russians in Manchuria. I simply desire to point out that Japan, now heading the yellow race, is just emerging from mediævalism; that feudalism existed in Japan when I was a boy, and the history of the world shows that following the termination of feudalism there always follows a long period of war and conquest.

I simply submit that there is a natural movement on the part of Japan, not only to organize her own people, but the peoples of China and all the peoples of Asia and the yellow races, to move out to what they believe is inevitable, a struggle for the supremacy of the world. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is of the utmost importance to mankind, to the future of civilization, that there should be placed, if necessary, a constraining power that will keep the yellow man in his habitat and have him meet the white man in commerce and industry as a friend, not in war as an enemy. [Applause.] I believe that down the march of the ages there goes the hand of Providence. I believe that America has been raised up and placed here between the white race and the yellow race. We do not desire conquest. We have not sought distant islands, and yet by a strange destiny America's feet are placed in the Sandwich Islands, in the Aleutian Islands, in Alaska, in Panama, in Samoa, in Guam, in the Philippine Islands, so that this great nation, the one mighty nation of peace, now spreads out over that whole ocean. I believe that this great continent of America was given to the peoples that have made this nation because they were to be a peace people. I believe that this continent has the mighty resources that produce the world's staples of clothing and food, and ultimately from its iron and coal the great manufactured staples, so that its influence may go to all lands, carrying policies and institutions based on justice and right that may cause the other peoples to meet each other as friends. I believe that America, standing upon the Hawaiian Islands, and with a Navy controlling the Pacific Ocean, can keep the peace there long enough until the white race and the yellow race can get together and work out a system upon which they can live in permanent peace. Therefore, I am in favor of the adoption of this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time, three and one-half minutes, to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, to those American citizens of pessimistic nature who think that the country is going to the devil through partisanship, it would be a gratifying spectacle to see how quickly the clouds of partisanship roll aside when a measure is proposed which is as broad in its patriotism as the country. When a committee comes forward with a suggestion that we should establish a much-needed naval station at a point that will make for the protection of the entire country, and which, let me say in passing, I hope will allay the nervousness of my Pacific coast friends, every man in this House, whether he come from Maine or from California, from the Gulf or from the Great Lakes, works shoulder to shoulder with every other man in order to carry out that suggestion. Like my friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] I opposed the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands, because it brought me and brought my country into contact with the yellow race. I knew that the white and the yellow race could not get together without a spirit of antagonism being present, and I dreaded the contact.

I favor the erection of these great fortifications upon the island because it will put a barrier between them and us which, I think, they can not get around. I sincerely hope, Mr. Speaker, and I believe, too, that the great coast-defense scheme inaugurated under the Administration of Mr. Cleveland when Mr. Endicott was Secretary of War will be prosecuted until every port and every harbor on both the oceans will be completely defended. And that, sir, supplementing this defense placed on the Hawaiian Islands, will remove, as was suggested here the other day by an eminent and venerable Member, the necessity for an exaggerated and costly development of the Navy. I believe that when we have prepared the coast defenses, as undoubtedly they will be prepared, and when we shall have completed the fortifications upon the island of Oahu there will no longer be the necessity for putting upon the people of this country the vast burden for militarism which we have imposed upon them in the last few years. I think, sir, that the mere fact that the Government of the United States, with a Treasury being depleted from day to day, I regret to say, but still overflowing, is prepared to protect every inch of its continental territory against assaults from all the people in the world who may have the audacity to undertake it of itself will operate as a measure for peace and prevent any such assaults. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time to the gentleman.

Mr. BATES. Of the nine minutes remaining, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, one minute is not long enough in which to say much, but this is an old hobby of mine. I do not come within the censure of the gentleman from Missouri, for ever since I have been in the Congress of the United States, since the Territory of Hawaii has been acquired, I have been begging the Committee on Appropriations not to waste money by building fortifications where they were not needed, but to build a great central fortification at Pearl Harbor, and I believe now that we can protect the coast better by fortifying Pearl Harbor than we can by any other method. My understanding is that the coast of California is not now protected, but it will be when we fortify Pearl Harbor.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BATES. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN].

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, the bill now before this House for consideration, and I hope for passage, is H. R. 18120, which bill provides for the establishment of a naval station at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii. This bill appropriates $700,000 and practically authorizes the expenditure of a further sum of $2,150,000. While this seems like a large sum of money, in reality the amount is insignificant in comparison with the benefits which, in my judgment, our country will reap from the passage of this bill. I regard this measure as one of the most important that will come before this Congress for determination.

This bill does not merely contemplate the establishment of an ordinary naval station in Hawaii, but a great naval base for the American Navy, including adequate dry-dock facilities, a vast coal depot, and such small amount of dredging as shall be necessary to make the entrance to this harbor easy and safe.

Every American citizen, regardless of political affiliations, is proud of the American Navy. Few more impressive sights have occurred in this nation than that stately line of sixteen American battle ships which a few months ago steamed seaward from the Atlantic coast to circle the world with a display of power, but on a mission of peace. Every American heart throbbed in patriot time an accompaniment to that spectacle.

A great navy is indeed typical of strength, and yet there is nothing more helpless in the world than a battle ship without the accessories that make it effective. A railroad engine is the most helpless thing on earth when it gets off the rails, and an American battle ship, or any battle ship, is the most helpless thing imaginable when separated from dry-dock facilities and from fuel supplies.

This bill is designed, in my judgment, to save the American people humiliation if not defeat some time in the future. Some men there are who think that a conflict is imminent between the American nation and the Asiatic races. Mr. Speaker, I am not one of those. I am not seeing any "yellow" visions these days. The American nation is now at peace with all the world, and I expect it to continue in those friendly relations. But it is the part of prudence to prepare in times of peace for emergencies.

No man who ever studied the map of the Pacific Ocean can have failed to notice the commanding position occupied by the Hawaiian Islands, situated in the very center thereof. These islands have been aptly styled the "Crossroads of the Pacific." They are situated some 2,200 miles west of San Francisco and about an equal distance from the entrance of Puget Sound. An American fleet stationed at that point with adequate facilities would be a great protection to the entire Pacific coast line of the American continent and a tower of strength to our American possessions in the Philippine islands.

However, I do not agree with the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] that the creation of a naval base in Hawaii would do away with all necessity for the further fortification of the Pacific coast line of the American continent. The establishment of this naval base in Hawaii will be a powerful protection to our entire Pacific coast line, but it will not entirely supersede the necessity for the maintenance of proper fortifications at both San Francisco and the entrance to Puget Sound.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been correctly described as one of the most important bills before the House. It is the most important military measure which Congress has to consider at this session, in my opinion. The merest tyro in military or naval strategy must see the importance of maintaining a proper base on the Hawaiian Islands, not only as a protection for our own coast, but as a preventive of that base falling into the hands of an enemy. It is in almost exactly a similar position to Malta in the Mediterranean Sea. England has spent tens of millions of dollars in constructing proper fortifications on Malta for exactly the same purpose that we should spend tens of millions of dollars for the proper protection of this great naval base.

It is not only an important matter itself, but, in my judgment, while it will not prevent the necessity of erecting fortifications on the Pacific coast, it will prevent the necessity of making expenditures so large compared with what it will require to fortify Hawaii that they will seem to be immeasurable. For every reason—and I am glad to see the House is in favor of this measure, basing my opinion on what has been said—for every reason this appropriation ought to be passed, and I wish it was much larger than the amount which has been reported by the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, some years ago Congress appropriated $645,000, with which a site was acquired at Pearl Harbor for a naval station. Since that time Congress has provided practically all the guns required for the defense of Pearl Harbor and of the proposed naval station, and yet so inharmonious has been the plan upon which the Government has proceeded that to-day it is impossible for a larger vessel than a good-sized tug to enter that harbor. If any criticism could be made of the proposed bill, it is that the amounts carried are insufficient for the purposes proposed. I am inclined to believe that the bill carries as much money as it will be possible to utilize during the next fiscal year. But when it is realized that it will require about $2,000,000 to dredge an adequate channel into Pearl Harbor, it is not difficult to see how insignificant an appropriation of $200,000 for that purpose is. For some mysterious reason it has been impossible to obtain a favorable recommendation from the Navy Department to proceed with the work of building this necessary outpost of the United States since the site has been acquired. It is to be hoped that with this bill, Mr. Speaker, that hereafter the Department will submit estimates and that Congress will appropriate all that can be utilized in each succeeding year. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DAWSON], a member of the committee.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, as has been so frequently said here this afternoon, this bill takes the first step in one of the most important military movements under the Government. I hope that great speed will occur in the passage of this bill. The real reason for haste in acting favorably on this bill has not been stated, but the fact remains that those islands of Hawaii, the key to the Pacific, the crossroads of the Pacific, lie there now practically defenseless. It was stated before the Committee on Naval Affairs that a single hostile battle ship could come to those islands and in half a day could capture them, occupy them, and hold them. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, in the moment remaining I wish to call the attention of the House to what a disadvantage it would be, taking up the line of argument of the gentleman who preceded me, if some hostile fleet or some hostile battle ship should take possession of Pearl Harbor and of the Hawaiian Islands, to have a coaling station of a possible maritime enemy within 2,100 miles of our coast, and, on the other hand, what an advantage it is that now they must traverse 4,000 miles there and 4,000 miles back again from a coaling base. Any maritime enemy would think twice before approaching our coast under such conditions, especially when our fleet could coal and repair in this almost perfect harbor at Honolulu, namely, Pearl Harbor. I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that, in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds had voted in favor thereof.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 246, nays 1, answered "present" 13, not voting 128, as follows:

GRANT MEMORIAL.

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 117 concerning the location of the Grant Memorial in the District of Columbia.

Resolved, etc., That the Grant Memorial is hereby located upon the site with reference to which the designs for the memorial were invited and submitted and accepted, being the large circular or elliptical plat between the White House grounds and the Washington Monument.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. CONNER. I demand a second.

Mr. MCCALL. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CONNER] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Speaker, I regret that in offering this resolution I have against me the adverse report of a committee for which I have very great respect, the Committee on the Library. At the same time I regard the matter of such importance that it should be passed upon by the House of Representatives. Of course with whatever verdict you may render I shall be entirely satisfied. I shall not go into the somewhat complicated history of the location of this memorial. The Commission having the matter in charge invited artists to submit designs, and in their invitation they asked that those designs should be especially adapted to the so-called "White Lot," which is the large elliptical tract of land between the White House and the Washington Monument. The designs were made by artists for that location and they were accepted, although the location was not at that time finally decided upon by the Commission. Very shortly a strenuous opposition from some source appeared against having the memorial placed between the White House and the Washington Monument. The committee had accepted the design. They yielded to the opposition, and they then had upon their hands the longest, if not the greatest, work of art in the world.

Mr. Casey and Mr. Shrady, the one the architect and the other the sculptor, had planned this particular memorial for a broad open field, and that means that the memorial was proportioned to the ample sweep of that location. The memorial itself, I should say, is 250-odd feet long by 70 feet wide and covers about 17,000 feet of land, and as one of the Commission, General Dodge, testified before the committee, in order to give it a proper setting it should have an area of 500 by 300 feet, amounting in all to about 150,000 square feet, or nearly 4 acres of land. I think you can see, having a memorial of that sort accepted and having the site for which it was designed taken away from it, that the Commission had a difficult task to find an adequate site. I do not think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], who appeared before the committee, at all overstated the matter when he said that this memorial had been buffeted all about the city; that it was to go back of the State Department and was buffeted out of there; it was to go back of the White House, and it was kicked out of there, and then it was to go out by the new station, and it was kicked out of there. The architect of the station protested that it ought not to be there, probably for the reason that strangers to the city might mistake such a colossal structure for the depot [laughter], and as a result, finally, of this buffeting around of the memorial and the crying demand of room, room, above all things 4 acres of room, it was found that the Botanic Garden, if given up to this purpose, would have the element of room, and, in my opinion, that is the only element that they do possess suitable for a memorial to General Grant.

Then the matter was finally settled, so far as the authority of law was concerned, upon an appropriation bill, on an amendment which first appeared in this House in a conference report in the last hours of a long session of Congress. I do not charge that there was anything at all underhanded in the way that report was put through the House. The fact that it was in charge of my friend from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] would be ample evidence that it was entirely aboveboard and all right as far as he was concerned; but we know that in the last nights of a session all of the various amendments, possibly 100 of them, can not be stated to the House, and there was no debate whatever upon this proposition. So that the first thing the public knew operations were begun in the Botanical Garden, some of the trees were threatened with destruction and a protest arose against the action it was intended to take.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I have said, the only qualification that this position has for the monument for Grant is that it has the requisite room. It reminds me of a neighbor of mine, Mr. Thomas W. Lawson, who did something that engaged the attention of one of the Russian grand dukes, and this Russian grand duke wished to show Mr. Lawson a courtesy, and so he sent him to Boston a fine speciment of a young polar bear and notified him that it would arrive at a certain time.

One day Mr. Lawson looked out of his office window and saw the streets blockaded in every direction, and a monstrous polar bear engaging the attention of all the boys in that section of the city. The streets were blockaded and the crowd rapidly increasing. He realized that he had something colossal upon his hands. He set men to work upon the telephones to find some place to put the bear, and then he sent out word "For heaven's sake keep him moving until I can find a place to put him in." [Laughter.] It was on that theory that the Grant Memorial was located in the Botanic Garden.

I do not think that is a location that should be given to perhaps the greatest general who has ever commanded the armies of the Republic. It is almost the lowest land in the District of Columbia. It is used for a purpose quite out of keeping with having a monument there, and it will either require the ultimate extinction of that Garden, or the memorial will have surroundings that are most incongruous.

Now, let me say one word as to the Garden. We all know the superintendent, that old Scotchman who has so nobly done his duty there for nearly sixty years, W. R. Smith. It does not pretend to be a national garden. With the Department of Agriculture conducting experiments, either directly or through the different State boards in every State of the Union, and which has every natural variety of climate and soil, we do not want a national garden to do these things at great expense artificially. But this Garden is of great use to the country and to Members of Congress.

We are given each year two or three boxes of plants, and there are hundreds of thousands of trees and rare plants growing in different parts of the country as a result of that work. They are growing in every Congressional district of the United States. I believe that the cost of maintaining that garden is very little more than the cost of maintaining the hothouses in connection with the executive department. This garden is peculiarly for the use of Members of Congress, just as those hothouses are peculiarly for the use of the executive department.

Then, Mr. Speaker, there is the Crittenden oak. I know it is said that that oak was not planted in accordance with an act of Congress, and that in order to make a tree historical there should be some form of legal action in connection with it; but it was planted there by one of the great men of this country, Senator Crittenden, of Kentucky, planted especially to commemorate those famous and well-meant but not successful efforts associated with his name—to preserve the Union without a war between the States. It has grown up there into a beautiful tree, but under a contract which has been made for its removal the soil is completely girdled 30 feet from its base and they are simply awaiting the action of this House to see whether they shall remove it entirely and possibly destroy it.

Now, I think that oak is more of a monument to peace than this memorial, which in all its bulk and throughout its whole 250 feet of longitude breathes of nothing but war. That tree will be a better monument to the cause for which Grant fought than the memorial it is proposed to erect.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should hope that if the pending resolution, which was introduced by my friend from Illinois Mr. MANN, were adopted, and if the memorial was ordered to be put upon the site for which it was designed, forces might be put in motion which would result in producing a monument to Grant upon possibly another location, which would speak of him not merely as a soldier, but also as a man and a statesman. Take that battery of cannon, the troop of soldiery, the whole structure; it speaks of war.

There is nothing to indicate that he was ever for eight years the Chief Magistrate at a most important period in the country's history. There is nothing there to indicate that it was under his Administration that the first great step was taken in the cause of international peace, and that the Geneva tribunal was established, that great landmark upon the pathway toward the peaceably settling of international differences and toward doing away with the arbitrament of war. It does not recall in any degree those magnificent words of his—grander than any of his victories—"Let us have peace," or those other words, when he said to the heroes who were surrendering to him, "Keep your horses, boys; you will need them for your spring plowing." [Applause.]

I say that such a memorial does no credit to General Grant, and I care not whether it has been passed upon by fifty Secretaries of War or fifty commissions. I can not give my consent as a Member of the House of Representatives to have such a memorial sanctioned and placed in the location in which it is proposed it shall be placed. [Applause.]

Mr. OLCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCALL. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. OLCOTT. Have not contracts been already entered into in relation to this memorial?

Mr. McCALL. It is undoubtedly true that contracts have been made, and I think the Government might have to pay damages if the work did not go on elsewhere under these contracts. I do not care whether it is true or not; when Congress has its attention called to this matter, it should do the right thing, regardless of a little claim for damages. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes.

Mr. McCALL. I will reserve the balance of my time, and yield two minutes of it to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DOUGLAS].

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to no man in this House or this country in reverence for the name of Ulysses S. Grant. This matter has come to me to-day most unexpectedly, but I would consider myself derelict if I did not plead for the cause that the gentleman from Massachusetts has pleaded for.

It is our sentiments after all that move us most, appeal as we will to our reason. It is a sentiment with me that compels me to arise, and to speak for these two minutes in behalf of this bill. For many many years I have cherished the kindliest regard for that venerable old gentleman who makes his home in the Botanic Garden, and who has made it there for fifty-odd years. The destruction of this garden, for that is what it is, means almost death. He has dwelt upon this matter; he has worried sadly over it; he has appealed to Members of Congress about it until it has become almost a matter with him of life and death.

Who is this man that it is proposed to wound so willfully by the location of this memorial in the garden and by tearing up the ground and tearing down the trees he has planted; trees which he has cherished with all that love he is capable of feeling? He is a man that has done more, in my judgment, for the shade trees of this country, more to inculcate in every quarter a love of trees and of nature, than any man in the country. I do hope before anyone votes to destroy what has become to him the dearest spot on earth by locating there this great 250-foot monument, that you will consider the matter with kindly care.

Mr. CONNER. Mr. Speaker, it is true that the Committee on the Library made a very thorough investigation of all the facts surrounding this transaction. It is true that it made a unanimous report, excepting the one member who filed a minority report, and who is in favor of the resolution which has been presented here to-day.

Mr. Speaker, I think the House should understand what is involved in this contention. If favorable action is taken on this resolution, it means the undoing of all that has been done. A commission, made up of very able gentlemen, General Dodge, the Secretary of War, and the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the Senate, undertook to find a suitable place to locate this memorial. Their first thought was to locate it south of the State, War, and Navy building, but they found objections were made to that location. They then undertook to locate it south of the White House, on the White Lot, and objections were made by prominent people to its location at that place. They then sought various other places in the city, and wherever they found one they found objections. They undertook to locate it on the Union Station grounds and objections were made to its location there. Finally, after consultation with artists, architects, and experts, they selected the ground down here in the Botanic Garden. The opinion of the experts, the Secretary of War, General Dodge, and all of the witnesses that appeared before the committee, was to the effect that this was the best location in the District of Columbia. It has already been located there, according to law. The contract has been let for the work and the work is proceeding. Even the contract has been let for the removal of the trees, which the testimony shows can be removed in almost absolute safety. Mr. Speaker, we have a condition existing to-day which argues against the adoption of this resolution and makes it appear unreasonable in the extreme.

I now yield four minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I propose simply to make a very plain statement of my attitude as a member of the Committee on the Library, which made the report against the removal of the Grant Memorial. The report was prepared and filed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] and concurred in by me. The members of the committee, except the chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL], were of opinion that the Grant Memorial should remain where it is located now under existing law, the sundry civil act of 1907, namely, in the National Botanic Garden. The gentleman from Georgia and I did not want to interfere with any trees. We were unwilling, however, to vote any money out of the Federal Treasury for the purpose of removing trees. We could not justify that before our constituents, we thought, and declined to do so. We found, however, that money was available which would authorize the Grant Commission to remove the trees, and take care of them, and permit the Grant Memorial to remain upon the site in the Botanic Garden selected by the Grant Commission. The testimony was abundant before our committee that the trees could be removed by tree-moving machinery without injuring them at all.

The weight of the testimony before the committee, and the action of the Grand Army of the Republic favoring the location in the Botanic Garden, added to the testimony of the Secretary of War, Mr. Taft, and former Secretary of War, Mr. Root, both of whom were in favor of keeping the location where it is, combined with the fact that the trees could be removed without injury, or additional expense to the Government, decided me to join in the report to keep the memorial in the Botanic Garden. Personally, I could not see my way clear to vote for its removal to the White Lot. That is the lot in which is located the Executive Mansion, which is occupied by all the Presidents of the country of whatever political faith.

I was averse to placing the memorial in front of the Union Station, because I did not think that was the proper location for many reasons which it is not necessary for me to enumerate, and I do not care to enumerate. Therefore, the trees not being destroyed, because they could be removed by proper machinery without one dollar of further tax or expense upon the Federal Treasury, by using a small part of the money which is now appropriated, and the weight of the testimony being in favor of permitting the Grant Memorial to stay where it is now located, under the law, in the Botanic Garden, I voted with my colleague [Mr. HOWARD] and other members of the committee to table the Sherley bill and also the Mann bill. I did not wish to put the memorial on the White Lot occupied by our Presidents.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I have not the time.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the gentleman does not want to mislead the House.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Certainly not. I was also against putting the memorial in front of the Union Station, and hence I voted with the other members, except the chairman, in the committee and decided the memorial ought to remain where it is now located by law.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman knows it is not proposed to put it inside the White Lot.

Mr. MANN. He does not know it and that is the reason he made this bad report.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I ask to have sufficient time to reply to that statement.

Mr. CONNER. I will yield the gentleman half a minute.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. If it is a bad report it was agreed to by Republicans and Democrats, and was a unanimous report, except the chairman. I know exactly, I will say to my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN], where the memorial is to go under his bill. The gentleman's bill proposes to locate it between the White House and the Washington Monument. Now, that is putting it in the lot which is occupied by the Executive Mansion.

Mr. MANN. But it does not provide for putting it in the White House lot at all.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. It is the ellipse, and that is a part of the White House lot, as I understand it, though I may be mistaken.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONNER. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Twelve and one-half minutes.

Mr. CONNER. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it is with some reluctance that I differ with the chairman of the committee on which I have the honor to serve. As a committee we approached this subject, I think, all of us, with absolutely unbiased minds, and in the short time at my disposal I would like to be able to present to the House some of the reasons which actuated the committee in arriving at the conclusions we have arrived at. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, a Commission was originally created composed of the Secretary of War, the chairman of the Senate Committee on the Library, Senator WETMORE, and General Dodge. That Commission was authorized to select design for a memorial and to locate that memorial. First, it was proposed that the memorial be erected upon the ellipse between the White House and the Monument. Objection was made. Thereupon, after careful consideration, the Commission decided that the Botanic Garden was the best site for the location of this memorial. I can do no better, I think, than to state to the Members of this House something of the testimony which influenced our committee. First, Mr. Secretary Root, who was at the time this memorial was selected the chairman of the Commission by virtue of his position as Secretary of War, says:

> Our work was not at all perfunctory; it went rather beyond the ordinary interest of the performance of a statutory duty. We had a competition for design, got some gentlemen to help us to select a design, and canvassed the subject of site very fully. We first thought of the site immediately south of the State, War, and Navy building, and we thought of a site on the White Lot south of the White House, but we were not fully satisfied with either of those, and went all over Washington and looked at every place we could think of, and we discussed every place that we looked at, until finally we came to the conclusion that the monument, or the memorial, as I think the statute calls it, ought to have a definite relation to the public buildings of Washington, and we settled upon a site directly in front of the Capitol as being the best possible site. We considered that we were authorized by the statute to select that site because, although it was within the fence which surrounds the Botanic Garden—the grounds of the Botanic Garden—it was unoccupied. So we selected that by a formal resolution.
> In selecting that site, we had a good many things in view. We considered that the statue, which made an appropriation of $250,000 for a memorial to General Grant, meant something more than the ordinary statue which, as Secretary of War, I have been engaged in putting up around the city as a member of similar commissions. We felt that it was the intention of Congress, plainly exhibited by the difference between that statute and the ordinary monument appropriations, to indicate a distinction, and that it was our duty to secure a design and to select a site which would be distinguished, and which would put the memorial to General Grant on a different footing from the memorials to many generals and public men of inferior place in history.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONNER. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOWDEN].

Mr. LOWDEN. Mr. Speaker, I have the honor to represent the district in which General Grant lived before the war and from which he went to the front. Out in Galena, at Grant's old home, each year on his birthday—a most impressive ceremony—is a celebration in honor of the first soldier of the nineteenth century. Naturally I have been very much interested in this question. I have read the testimony that was given at the hearings carefully, and I have been impelled to the conclusion that it would be a great mistake to move this monument from the Botanic Garden. The Commission that placed it there did so by a unanimous vote, and this was not a perfunctory Commission, but it was a labor of love on the part of its distinguished members, as is perfectly apparent from the testimony that was taken at the hearings. Gen. Grenville M. Dodge, chairman of that Commission, a trusted lieutenant of Grant's, a lifelong friend of Grant's, has given generously of his time to the cause. William H. Taft is a member of the Commission; Elihu Root was a member of the Commission; Senator Wetmore was the other member; and these distinguished gentlemen all unite in favor of the site in the Botanic Garden. At this late day to attempt a removal would be a great mistake.

It is urged that the Botanic Garden contains a historic tree—the Crittenden tree—which should be preserved as a suggestion of peace to the people of this country. I admire the history of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky whose name is associated with this tree. However, I submit that any memorial to Grant suggests peace between the North and the South more than any tree that was ever grown. [Applause.] The efforts of Senator Crittenden were abortive, because it was destined that peace should not dawn until Grant and Lee should meet at Appomattox. The Crittenden tree can but suggest the awful years of war in which Americans faced their countrymen. A memorial to Grant, even though the genius who created it should depict scenes of war, as stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, would speak of peace in all sections of our common country. Strange paradox! The man who planted this tree and who wrought for peace failed. The man of war, whose memorial we seek to erect, brought peace. No monument to Ulysses S. Grant which human hands can make will ever stand for aught but peace.

I also observe from a study of the hearings that nobody except this committee and a few others know or can learn which the Crittenden tree is. For the superintendent of the Botanic Garden stated that if he indicated to the people which it was the leaves would be plucked from it, one by one, until the tree was dead.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that, in view of the fact that the wishes of the Commission; the Army of the Tennessee, which first brought fame to Grant; the Army of the Cumberland; the Army of the Potomac; the Loyal Legion of Illinois and other States, and the family of General Grant, as I am informed, have united upon a site, this body will acquiesce. [Loud applause.]

Mr. CONNER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has five minutes and the gentleman from Iowa has five and a half minutes.

Mr. McCALL. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, proud of the fact that I am a son of a Confederate soldier who commanded a division in one of the greatest armies that ever fought for its convictions, I rise, sir, in behalf of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I wish I had time to pay just tribute to the great man whose memory this monument proposes to perpetuate—a man great in war. I should like to speak of his distinguished career as a military commander; I should like to refer to his career in peace; but, Mr. Speaker, in this short discussion we can only recall in a summarized way his achievements as a military commander and we can only remember that sublimest utterance that he ever spoke, when he said from the bottom of his great heart to his distressed country, "Let us have peace." [Applause.] But, sir, not having the time to pay his memory a just tribute by words, I will seek as best I can at this time to do so by voting to give his monument a conspicuous and elevated place, and not to put that memorial to this great general, to this great man, in an obscure corner in a hole in the ground. [Applause.]

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, a minute does not permit any real discussion, but I shall try to make it sufficient for a summary. This is not a contest between the admirers of General Grant and those who want to preserve certain trees and to keep the Botanic Garden as it is, for it is not the desire of any man to do aught that might disparage the fame and the memory of that great leader. It would be useless; it would be impossible so to do; but we believe that there ought not to be the need of the destruction of these trees in order to place this memorial. We further believe that the Botanic Garden does not afford a proper site for a memorial to General Grant, and it is not doing his name and his fame justice to place it there. We further believe that one of the chief motives that underlay the selection of this site was a desire to commit Congress to a proposed plan for the beautifying of the whole of Washington, and that had nothing to do with the honoring of General Grant's memory, but simply used the fact of putting this monument there as a means to start a programme along such lines. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, yesterday in this city memorial services were held to pay tribute to a great man—the late Crosby S. Noyes. Every speaker who referred to him spoke eloquently of the great work he did to beautify Washington and make this Capital a "City Beautiful." If he were alive to-day he would be with us in this fight to place the Grant Memorial in a more fitting place than the Botanic Garden—the most obscure and inappropriate place in all Washington.

This great memorial to General Grant should not be erected in the Botanic Garden. The most suitable place in all Washington for it is in the ellipse between the White House and the Washington Monument. There is where it was originally intended to be built; there is where it should be built. There is a great field; plenty of room—just the place for this great memorial. It was General Grant's field. It was his recreation ground. He planned it, and if his spirit could speak to us to-day it would be in favor of this most suitable location. There is no monument there to-day, and the greatest monument that we Members of Congress can put there is this magnificent memorial to General Grant to commemorate his brilliant military victories and patriotic civic achievements. Why were the plans changed? I do not know. A great mistake—a great blunder was made in doing so. But I intend to do all that I can now to rectify that mistake and to carry out the first idea—the original plan—of the men who initiated this memorial as a part of the scheme to beautify the city of Washington. To do this we must protect the Botanic Garden and build this memorial in the ellipse where it properly belongs. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONNER. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the Army of the Tennessee was the first army commanded by General Grant. In his lifetime there was organized a society composed of all the officers of that army. He was the president of that society. As early as thirteen years ago this society commenced the agitation for the erection of a suitable memorial to General Grant in the city of Washington. There was delay after delay in getting their bill through Congress, but finally it was passed in 1901. Then plans were called for and submitted to an advisory commission to the memorial commission. This advisory commission was headed by St. Gaudens, who has been lauded by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL], who makes this motion, who approved this design, and there is no question pending at all before the House as to getting a new design. It is solely a question of the location of this memorial.

Now, who put it down here? It was never located anywhere else. It is true that some thought existed of locating it in the ellipse. Objection was made——

Mr. SULZER. By whom?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The architect who drew the design said it was unfit for the ellipse; that the site selected was the best suited of any available in the city of Washington.

Congress vested the power to select the site in the Commission composed of General Dodge, Senator WETMORE, and Secretary Root, and subsequently this Commission included Secretary Taft in lieu of Secretary Root. This Commission was not ordered to report back to Congress upon locating the memorial. It located it in 1903—five years ago. The contracts were let. The bronze work is largely done and upon the ground. They are ready to put in the foundations and to construct the base for this gigantic memorial. After it was decided to locate it here the plans were revised and the memorial cut down in length and stairs put up from the rear to adapt it to this location. It is not designed, as even originally proposed, for the ellipse. Who is it that say it ought to go down here in the Botanic Garden? The Society of the Army of the Tennessee, the army from leading which he first won fame. Who signs the committee's report in that society? Gen. O. Howard, who, with General Dodge, constitute the only two surviving Army commanders of the entire Union Army. Who else indorses this site? The Commandery of the Loyal Legion of New York, of which he was president and a member, and the Commandery of the Loyal Legion of Illinois, the State that furnished him to his country. Who else? A collection of experts, summoned to advise the Commission, unanimously located it there. Who else? The American Institute of Architects has declared this as the best location in the city. Who else? The resident members of the International Society of Sculptors say this is the best location in Washington. Who else? The surviving members of the family of General Grant.

These gentlemen have gone over this city with fidelity trying to locate this statue in a suitable place to honor Grant, and everybody who has given substantial investigation agrees that this is the best in the city of Washington. Finally, when the gentleman from Massachusetts offered his resolution here in the early days of this session for its removal, and the resolution went to his own committee, that committee, after a patient and painstaking investigation, by a vote of 4 to 1, said that it ought to remain in the Botanic Garden. I want it to stand there; I want it to be built while Grant's old comrades in arms are living, so that they may participate in its construction and dedication. I protest against continuing these changes and these delays that have for thirteen years continued in opposition to the wishes of the officers of the Society of the Army of the Tennessee. [Loud applause.] If I have any time remaining, I yield it back to my colleague [Mr. CONNER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. CONNER. I yield that to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, they say the place chosen by a majority of the committee at the foot of Capitol hill is an obscure position upon which to locate a monument to General Grant. Is the Capitol of the Republic an obscure building? The patriots who will come to this city for a thousand years, if the Government shall so long endure, will make this building the Mecca of their visits, and of necessity will come close by the monument of the man who, next to Abraham Lincoln, made possible that this building should stand, the magnificent Capitol of a reunited nation. It is not obscure unless the site of the Capitol building itself is obscure. [Loud applause.]

Mr. McCALL. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not wonder that the majority of the Committee on the Library reported against the resolution which I introduced if they had the attitude of mind which the gentleman [Mr. THOMAS] who spoke here this afternoon had when he stated that my resolution proposed to place the memorial in the White House lot. Of course that is not the proposition. Nor do I wonder at the attitude of my distinguished colleague from Illinois, who represents the old Galena district, if he confuses in his mind the difference between the construction of a memorial to General Grant and the location of that memorial. All of those societies which are urging this location have had in mind the construction of a memorial to Grant. Like them, I want to see Grant honored. Mr. Speaker, I was born in Illinois, raised in Illinois, educated in Illinois, have lived in Illinois all my life, and expect to die in Illinois; and I believe that the nation owes to the great men whom Illinois contributed to the country—Abraham Lincoln and Ulysses S. Grant—a proper place for the location of the memorial. [Loud applause.] In the name of Illinois, in the name of the services rendered by the great men of that State, I protest against the burial of this memorial and the dwarfing of it, as it will be, under the Dome of the Capitol, in the lowest spot in the District of Columbia. I appeal to you to locate this memorial up alongside the great monument to Washington, near to the White House, where Grant served his country in a conspicuous and a fitting position, doing honor to a great man who honored his country, who is beloved in the North and in the South. Give him the right place. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that he was in doubt.

Mr. MANN. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 128, noes 104.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 134, nays 129, answered "present" 14, not voting 111, as follows:

YEAS—134.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 7, 1908.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. KEAN, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

ELLEN L. FAUNCE V. UNITED STATES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the reformed findings of fact filed by the court April 6, 1908, in the cause of Ellen L. Faunce, widow of Peter Faunce, deceased, v. United States, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its chief clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 20308) to establish a naval station at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

H. R. 4780. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to make certain disposition of obsolete Springfield rifles, caliber .45, bayonets and bayonet scabbards for same; and

H. R. 18689. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish two condemned brass or bronze cannon and cannon balls to the city of Winchester, Va.

ENLARGEMENT OF HOMESTEADS.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to call attention to the Calendar. In the General Orders, under Rule VIII, I find Order of Business 471, the bill (S. 6155) to provide for an enlarged homestead. I objected to the further consideration of the bill yesterday and asked that it should go under Rule IX. I think that was sufficient to send it under Rule IX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar will be corrected.

WATER-LINE ARMOR BELT.

Mr. HALE. I present a paper, being an extract from Rear-Admiral Evans's report to the Navy Department, dated at sea, en route to Magdalena Bay, March 6, 1908, on the location of water-line armor belt upon United States battle ships. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD, printed as a document, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

There being no objection, the paper was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, ordered to be printed as a document, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOCATION OF WATER-LINE ARMOR BELT UPON UNITED STATES BATTLE SHIPS.

[Extract from Rear-Admiral Evans's report to the Navy Department, dated at sea, en route to Magdalena Bay, March 6, 1908.]

Judging from the figures contained in the several replies from commanding officers which relate to this subject, it would appear that better protection might have been afforded had these belts been originally placed between 6 inches and 1 foot higher; this on the theory that the commanding officer would admit sufficient water before an action to sink the belt to within about 18 inches above the water line, but even this is open to question, for it has been noted that even when heavy laden and in the smooth to moderate seas, which have thus far characterized this cruise, the ships frequently expose their entire belt and the bottom plating beneath it. It must be remembered that even a 5 or a 6 inch shell (of which there would be a great number) could inflict a severe and dangerous injury if it struck below the belt, while otherwise the water line, even with the belt entirely submerged, is, on account of the casement, armor, and coal, immune to all except the heaviest projectiles. The fact is that under the sea conditions in which battles may be fought a belt of 8 feet in width, if considered alone, is too narrow to afford the desired protection, wherever it may be placed, and the question becomes an academic discussion, with certain arguments on each side. It is understood that on the latest ships this question is of little import, as the citadel armor is but 1 inch less in thickness than that on the water line, and for those ships already built it is believed that if bridges are removed and all weights which will be landed when war breaks out are taken into consideration, the ship will rise the 6 or 12 inches which is believed to be the maximum that it should be desired to raise them.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. FLINT. I move that the speech delivered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] before the Boston City Club, in Boston, Mass., March 20, 1908, on the subject of immigration, be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL.

Mr. NELSON. I move that Table Calendar No. 14, the bill (H. R. 20310) relating to the liability of common carriers by railroad to their employees in certain cases, passed by the House and now on the table, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It is very important legislation and I think that committee ought to consider the bill before it is acted upon.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I object to that order being made, if an objection carries it over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the present consideration of the motion submitted by the Senator from Minnesota.

SUSPENSION OF COMMODITY CLAUSE, INTERSTATE COMMERCE LAW.

Mr. ELKINS. At yesterday's session I reported the joint resolution (S. R. 74) suspending the commodity clause of the present interstate-commerce law, and I find that there is a mistake in the print. The amendment of the committee striking out "May" and inserting "January" ought to come in on page 2, line 12, instead of page 1, line 11. On page 1, line 11 in the print, the word "May" is stricken out and "January" inserted. The word "January" ought to have been put in on page 2, line 12, after the word "to," so as to read "prior to January 1, 1910." I ask that the correction be made in the report. It is merely a clerical error.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1577) for the relief of Sergt. James W. Kingon, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report (No. 477) thereon.

Mr. SMOOT (for Mr. CLAPP), from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6161) for the relief of Rufus Neal, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report (No. 478) thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. On yesterday I reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia the bill (H. R. 17305) to regulate the establishment and maintenance of private hospitals and asylums in the District of Columbia. I now report adversely Senate bill No. 5361 on the same subject and submit an adverse report (No. 479) thereon, which I ask may be agreed to and that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5252) to provide for the building of a public avenue on the south side of the Potomac River from the city of Washington to Mount Vernon, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 480) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5850) to appropriate money for the payment of certain advances made to the United States by the State of Maryland, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WARREN introduced a bill (S. 6542) providing that the State of Wyoming be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and to select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DIXON introduced a bill (S. 6543) to authorize the expenditure of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for subsistence and civilization of the Northern Cheyennes and Arapahoes for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1907, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. TELLER introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 78) establishing the boundary line between the States of Colorado and Oklahoma and the Territory of New Mexico, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12438) to amend the charter of the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company, which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BURKETT submitted an amendment relative to the fixing of the official standards for the grading of grain, intended to be proposed by him to the agricultural appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,000 to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make demonstrations of the different processes of manufacturing denaturized alcohol at the Corn Exposition to be held at Omaha, Nebr., from December 9 to 19, 1908, intended to be proposed by him to the agricultural appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. CLAY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. CLAY to the bill (H. R. 15372) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the Court of Claims under the acts of March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the "Bowman and the Tucker acts," viz: Insert the following:

"To A. G. McDonald, administrator of Robert H. Green, deceased, of Clayton County, Ga., $595, being the amount found due by the Court of Claims and reported to Congress in House Document No. 846, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session."

FRANCES E. RANSDELL.

Mr. HEMENWAY submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Frances E. Ransdell, widow of Edward S. Ransdell, late a policeman in the employ of Congress, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving at the time of his demise, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, said payment to be considered in full of all funeral expenses or other allowances.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. M. C. LATTA, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following act:

On April 2:

S. 5589. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 20308. An act to establish a naval station at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I rise to make a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate yesterday passed the Army appropriation bill.

I do not make this motion expecting to interfere with the bill, and I congratulate the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] for the ability and skill that he displayed in the management of the bill which passed the Senate yesterday. Having no expectation that the bill would be up or would be passed, I had been called away to the State Department by a very important matter going on there now relating to troubles between the citizens of my own State and those of New Brunswick, and I was not therefore enabled to call the attention of the Senate, which I shall do now, with the leave of the Senate, very briefly, to what was emphasized by the passage of the Army appropriation bill with its many provisions, increasing the military establishment.

It was not the fault of the Senator in charge that the bill embodies so large an increase. It is what is going on constantly without all Senators or the country being aware of it—the enormous increases of the military establishment to the prejudice of all other appropriations and claims.

We can not get, Mr. President, consideration of other bills because, as everybody knows, the revenues are likely to wane, and are now waning, and we are likely to be confronted with a deficit; and not many months ahead we shall be found spending more money than comes into the Treasury from the existing and ordinary sources.

We can not get the omnibus claims bill passed, which has a thousand items that ought to be paid as much as a note of hand ought to be paid; and we are to have no river and harbor bill, with all the benefits that that bill adds to the business of the country, because it is a peace measure. We must have no public building bills, which are of actual and real benefit to the convenience of the country in the transaction of the public business in which every Senator and Representative is engaged, because the military expenses are mounting so rapidly that we can not afford these items that are for peace.

I wish to call attention to the items, that the Senate and the country may realize what we are doing for the military establishment. I mean by that the Army and the Navy and all military appropriations. The Army appropriation bill of last year for 1907–8 covered an appropriation of seventy-eight million and odd hundred thousand dollars. The bill which passed the Senate yesterday under the skillful management of the Senator from Wyoming carries an appropriation of ninety-eight million and odd hundred thousand dollars, almost $99,000,000, an increase of $20,000,000.

Mr. WARREN. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator speaks truly, of course, as he always does, when he says the Army appropriation bill carried some $78,000,000 last year. There was also a large sum carried on the general deficiency bill, and we have also already appropriated in urgent deficiency bills this year to piece out last year's appropriations something like $4,000,000 more. I do not know how much more we shall yet have to appropriate to close accounts to July 1, 1908.

On the other hand, I will say that there will be turned back into the Treasury from last year's appropriation on the pay account nearly $2,000,000. Of course it can not be taken from the pay-account fund and used for other purposes. There will doubtless be other balances covered back into the Treasury from other unused funds.

I want to say furthermore that the Committee on Military Affairs, in amending the present bill providing for the fiscal year 1909, have endeavored to put the amount high enough so that if we are fortunate enough to retain the items in conference we may not next year have deficiencies, which I know are so offensive, and properly so, to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I shall expect that quite a large amount of the $98,000,000 and over that the bill contains, if we are fortunate enough to hold it, will go back into the Treasury unused. The Department can only expend the funds we provide under the law and in a lawful manner. I think the Senator will agree with me and prefer that we should appropriate more and have no deficiency, and let the residue at the end of the year go back into the Treasury, rather than to be constantly pestered with deficiencies.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is just right. Before he came in I had taken occasion to say that the large appropriations, the startling appropriations, in the bill are not his fault.

I do not find myself in so hopeful a condition as the Senator is about any of the money provided for in this great bill being unexpended and turned into the Treasury. We shall be fortunate if they prevent deficiencies, and in that the Senator is right in making the amount large enough so as to try and prevent deficiencies in the future.

I am not dealing, Mr. President, in a fault-finding way with any particular item being put upon this bill, but I want to show the Senate that not only is here an increase in this part of the military establishment of $20,000,000, but that every item of increase represents great appropriations for the future. Not a single item that I know of in the bill is temporary, but it will be carried into the appropriations for the future.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, that statement is generally true; but there are items of quite a considerable amount contained in the bill, which the Senator will realize when he analyzes it closely, as he will, are for permanent purchases, which need not be renewed.

Mr. HALE. I understand that, because I have a list of them here. They are the kind of appropriations that, while distinctive by themselves, may not be repeated next year. Yet the general needs of the establishment every year will call for corresponding items or other items of the kind. So I have no hope of decreased appropriations; and I want the Senate to understand that my protest is not so much against what is appropriated now as because it means not only the same appropriations, but additional appropriations next year.

I have also the figures in the other military branch of the Government, the Navy Department. The showing there, Mr. President, is more startling than in the War Department. The naval appropriations for the last session of the last Congress were ninety-nine million six hundred thousand and odd—almost $100,000,000. This year the appropriations for the Navy Department, when all aggregated—and most of them will be upon the naval appropriation bill—will, I venture to say, be more than $120,000,000. There is another increase of $20,000,000 in this one year in that establishment. Mr. President, I am not reckoning on the basis of what I call the extravagant programme that is afoot for an enormous increase by big battle ships, but a moderate programme, not of four battle ships, but of two battle ships. The appropriations will be $120,000,000 for the Navy.

And, Mr. President, more, perhaps, in the Navy than in the Army; when in building up the Navy you provide for a big ship costing $10,000,000 you have only begun to spend money. By that you commit the country, necessarily, to the repairs and the expenses of maintenance, and it is a constantly increasing appropriation.

If we go on, Mr. President, as we are going on, the naval appropriations in three or four years will be $150,000,000 annually. The total war and military expenditures of the Government, as it was characterized by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the House, for the present and future and past wars, including the pension bill, which is increasing all the time, amount to 70 per cent of the revenues of the Government. I do not think Senators realize that within a few years, so greatly have the course of expenditures and the demands upon the Treasury increased in the military part of it, to the prejudice of the civil and peaceful part, that 70 per cent of the entire revenues are taken, as the chairman of the House committee states it, for present wars and future wars and past wars.

Now, I do not ask, and I do not expect, and if I had been present yesterday I should not have expected, to change an item in this appropriation bill. It is a part of the general policy that is going on of increasing the Army.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to ask the Senator if his eye caught an article, apparently inspired, I will say, in this morning's Washington Post, which proposes a radical reorganization of the Army with a still further enormous increase of expenditures.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Maine permit me to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I should like to have the Senator from New Hampshire state whether he considers that an inspired article or not.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggested that it sounded that way.

Mr. STONE. By whom was it inspired?

Mr. WARREN. I have seen a great many articles under the same authorship in the last year or two that have not been inspired.

Mr GALLINGER. It may not have been inspired, but it sounds as though it was pretty well considered, and that the information must have been obtained from some reliable source. It may not be so, but at any rate it is along the line of this increase of military expenditures that we are getting accustomed to, and I had an impression from reading it that it was probably a correct statement of conditions that we would have to meet in the near future. It may not be so.

Mr. BACON. My recollection is that the article states that it is by authority.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; it does.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. HALE. I always yield to the Senator.

Mr. ALDRICH. I simply want, by the courtesy of the Senator from Maine, to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs if I understand him aright in making the statement that he certainly is not in favor of the proposed enormous increase in the Army?

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Maine permit me just a word?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The article that the Senator from New Hampshire alludes to is, I assume, an article in this morning's Washington Post, written by a man under his own name. I do not know anything about the fact as to whether he was inspired in writing that article or not, but I know that within the last fifteen months this same man has had columns in the Chicago Tribune in regard to myself, making charges utterly unfounded and untrue, and that he has made other attacks upon other people and States which have been resented by Senators upon this floor.

I assume that the only foundation he has for this Post article may be knowledge of a plan of work laid out in the War Department along with many other plans which would provide, if the Army is to be increased, how it should be increased, and so forth. I have not myself the slightest idea that the article in question is inspired so far as it assumes that the plan of the War Department is that we are going to be asked here in Congress to support and appropriate for an Army of 125,000 regulars at present or in the near future. Certainly I should be very slow in committing myself to any such scheme.

Now, as to this writer of the article mentioned, I do not wish to say that he may not have information or foundation of some kind. He got information last year, I understand, regarding me personally from the feeble-minded secretary of a Department chief or head, and also from the weak-minded or radical and erratic head of the Department himself, a man who is not now one of the Secretaries; not now in the President's Cabinet.

Mr. ALDRICH. My purpose was not to inquire into the personal relations of the Senator from Wyoming with any correspondent, but if we are to have a semiofficial statement on the subject of a radical and enormous increase of the Army, I was anxious that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs should make a semiofficial statement, or an official statement, to the contrary, because I think it important that here and elsewhere—that is, among the people who are to decide this question, I suppose, ultimately—there should be statements made that there is no such increase in the Army contemplated.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CULBERSON. Just a moment for an inquiry. Some of us may not be quite clear about this matter, and consequently I desire to ask if this inquiry relates to a statement in the Washington Post of this morning that the Secretary of War is in favor of a reorganization of the Army and of increasing it to 125,000 men?

Mr. HALE. I was just coming to that, and I will state what my view about it is. The appearance of the article for whatever it may be worth is one of the things that brought me to my feet this morning upon this matter.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator yield to me a moment right there?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I understand perfectly the inquiry of the Senator from Rhode Island, but I take this occasion to say what I think every Senator understands, that it is not always safe to take every proposition that may be seen in print as an absolute fact. I make no accusation in this case against the author of the article. He does not say that this doubling of the Army is to be done. In my opinion, he gets this information as newspaper men usually get a great deal of information, just a little ahead of what actually occurs, and what they suspect may some time occur. And so they take long chances and print it.

I will say, as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that this is the first I have heard that the Secretary of War entertains any such ideas. I have known that, among other things the General Staff figure upon, are plans of reductions and increases and changes, and I am assuming that that information arrived at some point where the very enterprising and talented man I have mentioned has intercepted it and has obtained a glimpse of it, and he publishes it as a matter of interest to the ordinary reader.

I myself hope that the bills for the Army may not be materially increased unless war or something unforeseen occurs.

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. President, I will go on and finish what I have to say as soon as possible, because I am in the way of the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] perhaps.

Mr. WARREN. I beg the Senator's pardon for interrupting him.

Mr. HALE. I am very glad, indeed, to hear from the Senator.

I know nothing about this correspondent, John Callan O'Laughlin, but every reader of the Washington papers, particularly of the Washington Post, knows that he has taken into his jurisdiction almost every conceivable subject during the past winter, and has claimed to speak with authority. Nobody would read the long communications which appear in the Post almost every day but for the assumption in the beginning of each article. This article begins:

This is the judgment of William H. Taft, Secretary of War.

I hope he is wrong; I hope the enormous, unreasonable, and wicked programme that is laid out in this interview is not the judgment of the Secretary of War. But the articles claim so much authority—they claim to speak ex cathedra—that they attract attention and arouse interest and increase the alarm of conservative men over the way that we are going on.

As I said, the appearance of this article, for whatever it is worth, was one of the things that led me to make the statements I have made and draw the conclusions which I am drawing in what I am saying here.

The present Army is 65,000 men. Quite a proportion of that Army—I do not know what the amount is, but I have the number of regiments, infantry, cavalry, and all—are in the Philippine Islands. Perhaps there are three or four thousand men in Cuba, and the rest are disposed of around in posts and at the cities in this country.

Nobody except the War Department and the General Staff and the officials of that Department is crying for an increase. But if any Senator should go to the General Staff of the Army, as Senators have within a few days, upon a discussion of matters relating to the Army, you will be told at the office of the head of the General Staff that the Army has got to be doubled. That is not Mr. John Callan O'Laughlin, but it is the head of the operating part of the Army, who is practically the authority there in the prolonged and frequent and necessary absences of the Secretary of War.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from Maine permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. The writer the Senator speaks of seems to have knowledge that no one else has. It seems that he has the ear of the Administration, and also has the right to look at confidential reports that are made. From the statement I made yesterday, it appears that he had access to the confidential report that was made by a Mr. Russell to the Attorney-General. He also tells what the Administration is going to do in the South. Who is this gentleman that knows so much? He knows all about what the Administration is going to do and what Mr. Taft is in favor of.

Mr. HALE. I think we will dismiss him, except as to the article to which I have referred, which the Senator from New Hampshire called out.

Now, let me read some more. This is not put in doubtful form. It is not prefaced with an "it is said," "it is rumored," "it is believed." It is put authoritatively apparently:

The increase that Secretary Taft wants is that which in his judgment the needs of the country require. He is anxious that the nation shall have ready for service a first line of defense, behind which further mobilization may be effected. Therefore he considers a fair provision—a fair provision would be 65,000 infantry, 25,000 cavalry, 12,500 field artillery, and 22,500 engineers, signal corps, service corps, etc.

Not an extravagant provision—

I have added this up because they are interesting figures. Mr. O'Laughlin did not add them up and did not need to. The present Army, costing $100,000,000 a year, is 65,000 men.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator is to accept the Post's article as the text upon which he bases his remarks, he should reduce the number. The number which that gentleman gives, I believe, is 59,000, as I have figured it up. Perhaps the Senator has it.

Mr. HALE. I am reading from the Post article just as I find it in the text.

So with an army of 65,000 men, if this programme is to be carried out or is to be urged upon Congress, and we are to pass bills in accordance with this urgency, we will have an Army costing $200,000,000 a year.

Mr. President, nothing short of that will satisfy the Army, the General Staff, and the authorities. I am bound to say, Mr. President, that I do not believe the Secretary of War, with all his experience, with his knowledge of public affairs, with his large mind, and generous as he is with reference to appropriations, has ever committed himself to this enormous and unreasonable and, I repeat it, wicked programme.

Why this man has assumed to speak for him I do not know. The Secretary has in some of his speeches indicated that the Army ought to be increased. I do not agree with him in that respect, but I do not yet believe, and I hope I shall not be called upon to believe now or hereafter, wherever the Secretary of War may be, or whatever he may be, that we shall be called upon for this enormous programme. I hope and I believe that to the extent that it is claimed here this author is doing injustice to the Secretary.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator, on the inquiry of the Senator from New Hampshire, called attention to the article which appears in the Washington Post, and has suggested that there are phrases in it which indicate that it has been inspired; and he has read one or two paragraphs indicative of inspiration. I call his attention to a more emphatic statement than any to which he has referred so far, and it is this:

It is a big programme Mr. Taft has prepared; but it is one the importance of which can not be too strongly impressed upon the country.

It is a direct statement that the programme suggested in this article had been prepared by the Secretary of War.

Mr. HALE. Well, Mr. President, I still have in my mind a residuum of hope that that is not so, and that the Secretary has not committed himself to this enormous and wasteful expenditure of the resources of the Government drawn by taxation from all the people.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the Senator permit another interruption?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. It has been suggested to me by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. FRAZIER] to call attention to the following sentence in the article:

That Secretary Taft has outlined a plan of comprehensive reorganization which I have been permitted to describe—

That is still more emphatic.

Mr. HALE. I am very sorry that the War Department let—I had almost said the imagination of—this correspondent loose on this subject. I do not know that it is imaginary; I hope it is, but I am sorry that access has been given to anybody who will bring it before the public in a notable way, because an article of this kind in the Washington Post, which is a great newspaper that everybody reads and which is read all over the country, is not like the utterance of an obscure newspaper. It is important; it is worth consideration, and I am sorry if the War Department has furnished Mr. O'Laughlin with any facts that justify his statement of what they propose.

I shall, Mr. President, have accomplished my purpose in calling the attention of the Senate to this one distinctive feature that is going on everywhere in every branch of the Government—the enormous increases of the military establishment of our Government to the prejudice and hurt of appropriations that are peaceful in their kind and which deal, not with soldiers and sailors, and armies and navies, and ranks and grades, and epaulets and paraphernalia——

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HALE. I do.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I have so much respect for the good judgment of the Senator from Maine that I sometimes feel embarrassed in so frequently going to him for information.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will not discontinue that habit.

Mr. MONEY. I have acquired that habit. I want to ask the Senator now what would be the size of the American Army if the foreign policy of this Government shall persist, and if we are to continue the control and subjugation of great colonies, or dependencies rather—for they are not colonies, but dependencies—whether he thinks that the present Army establishment will be sufficient?

Mr. HALE. I think it is not only sufficient, but I think, while we are burdened with that pestilent curse which is on our shoulders—the Philippine Islands—we have got to have considerable of an Army there, and we are appropriating for that, and granting that, granting what we have in Cuba, admitting that at present we have got these burdens upon us and can not rid ourselves just now of them, the present Army is large enough and is larger than is needed. Nobody can tell me in detail where all the rest of the Army is doing any useful service. The General Staff will not let an old, rickety, almost wrecked Army post in the West be abandoned, for the reason that when they come in with this programme of doubling the Army they want those posts in order to show that the Army is all over the country. I defy any Senator to go up to the General Staff and get an old and useless Army post out West abandoned.

Now, somebody may say that I am too severe upon these authorities of the Army; but I have lived long enough to try to see more than one side of a question, and the officers of the Army and the Navy have nothing in their minds—and that is natural—but the two establishments. The Army sees nothing but the Army; and the Army's idea of an immense revenue pouring in for the uses of the Government is that it makes a great reservoir for Army appropriations. With some exceptions, the naval officers have the same idea. Anybody who has listened to the debate for the last day or two in the other branch of Congress will see how this exploiting of enormous appropriations for the Navy is brought out. We must have a Navy; and we have got to-day, practically, in actual force and strength and usefulness the second navy in the world; and yet naval officers and naval boards tell us that we need to double it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HALE. I do.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator believe we ought to drop from the position of second naval power? I am asking for information, because, of course, I am not interested in naval matters directly, and I would like the Senator's opinion about where we ought to stand as a nation as to our naval power.

Mr. HALE. That depends something upon what other nations do. I do not object if we can keep the Navy where it is and not increase it. I am not opposed to keeping it up to where it is now, although it is useless largely, and always will be. The best of it is to-day engaged in a cruise around the world, which will be very expensive and which will help to wear out the Navy, and we shall be called upon to appropriate for repairs and improvements resulting from the cruise, all showing that there is no legitimate use even for the Navy of the extent that we have now; but I am not for cutting it down.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HALE. I do.

Mr. BACON. Referring to the inquiry made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], I think I remember some years since, when the naval establishment was under discussion, hearing the learned Senator from Maine say that, in his opinion, the retention of the Philippine Islands would require a navy 50 per cent larger than would otherwise be required by the American Government. Does the Senator from Maine recall that statement?

Mr. HALE. Yes; and we have got to-day a Navy that is more than double what it was at that time. Senators do not realize how immense——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not desire the Senator from Maine to understand me as taking issue with the position which he is now advocating, but, on the contrary, I desire to call his attention to something which I thought substantiated what he is now saying——

Mr. HALE. It does.

Mr. BACON. That the Senator had said six or eight years ago, standing where he now stands, within my hearing, that the retention of the Philippine Islands would require, as it has required, the increase of the Navy to an extent at least 50 per cent greater than otherwise would have been required.

Mr. HALE. I do not pretend to be much of a prophet, but my forecast then was wise. We have since that day more than doubled the Navy, and largely on account of our acquisition—such as it is—of those foreign outside insular possessions. But I am not going into that.

I have, Mr. President, as I have said, accomplished my purpose in calling the attention of the Senate and of the country to this condition and to these great increases in appropriations for the military establishment.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] says that he has accomplished his purpose. With all due deference to the Senator from Maine, it does seem to me that it ought to be carried one step further. Year after year these appropriations grow upon us; year after year we are told that in the future these increases must be stopped. During this present session Members of both Houses have heard great complaint about the growth of these appropriations.

I, for one, while it is a popular thing to talk about a great Army, am in sympathy with what the Senator from Maine says. With my brief service in the Senate, it would be presumptuous for me to undertake to put a stop to this. Somewhere we have got to stop, and it does seem to me that, with the prestige, the service, and the position of the Senator from Maine, at this time we ought to go one step further. We ought to move to reconsider the vote, and if there were but two votes for that proposition, that would be the accomplishment of something. Then, if possible, we should take this bill and begin now and here to exercise the prerogative of the Senate in the disposition of these appropriations. It may be presumptuous for me to suggest this to the Senator from Maine; but, for one, I should like an opportunity, if it were only with one other, to join in an effort beyond the mere criticism of appropriation bills, and take one of these bills and proceed to legislate upon it from the standpoint of the legislative department of this Government.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is quite right. I wish we could do what he has outlined. It ought to be done. I can only say, for his encouragement and for the information of other Senators, that it is a practical question, not merely of criticism, but of what we shall do in the way of extending the other branches of the military department of the Government. The Navy will be before the Senate in the naval appropriation bill, when ample opportunity will be given Senators, like the Senator from Minnesota, not simply to criticise, as he says, which is ineffective, but to legislate and stop and limit appropriations.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator has said a very great deal about the proposed increases, as planned by the War Department, in our military establishment. I want to ask the Senator whether the Department has given no reasons whatever for these proposed increases which have been made?

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Indiana will speak louder, so that we may hear him on this side.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I asked the Senator from Maine whether or not, in the propositions that we have heard referred to from the War Department for the increase of our military establishment, the War Department had given any reasons for this increase, and if so, what they were?

Mr. HALE. I know generally——

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. The remarks of the Senator from Maine might possibly convey the idea that this was an increase in the Army, but I suppose he means that it is an increase in the appropriation, which, perhaps, as a member of the Military Committee, I can explain by saying that $7,000,000 of the increase in the Army appropriation bill is for the increased pay of officers and enlisted men.

Mr. HALE. I have said that the provisions are necessary, but when we incorporate them in the bill, as we ought to and as we have to, they will be in the bill of next year just the same, and every year they will be added to so much.

Mr. SCOTT. I take it that the Senator would not want to leave the impression that every year we would have to increase the pay of officers and enlisted men.

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. SCOTT. That is a large item in this bill.

Mr. HALE. But we will have to keep up the increase we make this year.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HALE. I do.

Mr. BACON. I desire to make a suggestion, which I hope will be kindly taken by the Senator from Maine. In a practical way I am entirely in sympathy with him in his protest against the tremendous expenditures that are being made, but I want to suggest to the Senator, before he yields the floor, that the question of expenditure is one that the Senate, under the machinery with which we work, find it impossible to practically deal with. The naval establishment and the war establishment are immense affairs, involving a multitude of details, and the appropriation bills, involving hundreds of millions of dollars, are made up of separate expenditures, which only a committee can properly investigate and which the committee alone does investigate.

The Senator is, I may say, one of the principal leading members upon the Appropriations Committee so far as practical work is concerned, and I am sure he will recognize the correctness of the statement which I have just made. These bills come in, and it is impossible for Senators who are not on the committee to be informed of the vast multitude of details which make up this enormous aggregate.

Take the Army appropriation bill with which we dealt on yesterday. Most of the matter comes from the House of Representatives, and I suppose it is in a degree accepted by the Senate as the work of the House, but the committee investigate so far as it is necessary to see whether they approve it. Then they proceed to the consideration of matters which require additional appropriations, and they come before us in the way of amendments. When these bills come before the Senate, as we all know, the custom is practically for nothing to be considered by the Senate except the Senate amendments.

So far as the appropriations are concerned, nineteen-twentieths of them or nine-tenths of them are matters which are not affected by amendments, and there is no opportunity under our practice for Senators to judge of whether or not these vast expenditures made upon these innumerable details are correct or not correct.

I do not know how far the suggestion is practical; but possibly if the Appropriations Committee—the most important in the Senate and the hardest working committee in the Senate, I will say—will take the Senate a little more into its confidence when bills are before the Senate, and not simply limit their information as to the details of amendments and the causes for amendments, but give us some insight into the vast information which they necessarily must have of those things which make up the magnitude of these bills, we shall be in a better position to realize where there may be extravagance and where there may be expenditures which are unnecessary and which may be curbed. Under the present system, however, which practically limits the consideration of an appropriation bill in the Senate to the question of whether amendments are proper or improper, there is no opportunity for Senators to know whether the vast mass of appropriation is within proper limits or whether it exceeds those limits.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, that is a difficulty which, if it really exists, can not be cured except by Senators. The appropriation bills are reported from the committees with amendments. We have no rules here that limit or shut off debate, and any Senator may inquire of the Senator in charge of an appropriation bill not only with reference to the Senate committee amendments, but as to every provision incorporated by the other House, and it is the business of Senators upon the Appropriations Committee and of Senators in charge of such bills, as yesterday it was the business of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] to answer, as he did, every question.

I may say here, in passing, that this bill does not come from the Committee on Appropriations. It is one of the bills the burden of which was taken, by the consent of the Committee on Appropriations, and given to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WARREN. Many years ago.

Mr. HALE. Yes, years ago; and I am glad to say, generally, that the committee is growing conservative in its action, and the bill fell into good hands when it fell into the hands of the Senator from Wyoming. I do not think, if any question had been asked him about any matter in the bill, that the Senator would not have been ready, armed, and equipped to answer it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE and Mr. BACON addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BACON. I fully agree with everything the Senator has said——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] was first recognized.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Chair's pardon. I misunderstood.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is all right. Let the Senator go ahead. I yield to the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I want to say, very briefly, that I fully agree with everything the Senator from Maine has said. It is true that not only the Appropriations Committee proper, but the other committees which have charge of appropriation bills—and I had them in mind when I referred to the Appropriations Committee—are always prepared, and do answer questions; but it is a fact, as I stated, that those questions are generally limited to matters arising out of amendments offered in the Senate.

The suggestion which I was making to the Senator was not that the Senators in charge of such bills should be prepared to answer questions, which are generally limited to amendments, but that in the presentation of these bills to the Senate they would take the Senate at large a little more into their confidence in the explanation of items about which Senators do not make inquiry, because they are really not in a position to make inquiry. Here, for instance, is a paragraph in a bill enumerating a certain class of appropriations, and $10,000,000, it is said, is the total. About all that is read from the Secretary's desk is the heading of that paragraph and the amount appropriated, the rest being skipped. I do not object to skipping, so far as the question of time is concerned. I only state that as an illustration of the utter impossibility of Senators who are not familiar with the details which have been communicated to the Appropriations Committee either to judge in the matter or to make intelligent inquiry regarding it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Evidently the interruption of Senators has distracted the Senator from Maine from answering the question which I asked him. The burden of the Senator's illuminating remarks, to which I listened with keen interest, was concerning the proposed increase in the Army, and that has taken up a good while. The Senator has said, not only on the authority of this clipping from the Post, but upon statements made to Senators who have gone to the War Department, that the proposition was to greatly enlarge our military establishment. The question I asked was, Does the War Department give no reasons for that proposed increase?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And if they do give them, what are they?

Mr. HALE. They give just the reasons that are given in this article.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have not read the article.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will read the article, he will find just what the reasons are—that this increase is necessary to prepare us for a big war.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And not merely for the consumption of appropriations?

Mr. HALE. It is said that we must have a larger Army and a larger Navy, and the reasons are all given in this article.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The reason I asked the question was that it seemed to me rather inconceivable that a Department of the Government would propose anything involving a large appropriation of money unless they had substantial and intelligent reasons back of it. I had listened carefully to the Senator from Maine and heard him assign no other reason than that they seemed to think they had to absorb as large appropriations as possible; and I thought they might have more valid reasons for their desire to increase the size of the military establishment.

Mr. HALE. They give the same reasons that are given in the article.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, perhaps that clipping had better be placed on record, in order that not only the criticisms may appear, but that the reasons may appear.

Mr. HALE. Unless some Senator desires——

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to say a few words before the Senator from Maine withdraws his motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. WARREN. I understand the Senator from Maine has the floor. If the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] is not in a hurry, I should like to say a few words.

Mr. HALE. What I was proposing, Mr. President, was, after Senators had debated this matter to their content, to withdraw the motion and take this matter away from the Senate; but I will not do that at present if Senators desire to speak.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will yield to the Senator from Wyoming, though I only wanted to speak for a moment.

Mr. WARREN. Very well; go ahead.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I hope that the timely utterances of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] will have the serious attention of the Senate, especially of Senators sitting upon this side of the Chamber, who are responsible for legislation. Up to this morning we have had in the present fiscal year an excess of expenditures above receipts of $38,000,000. In the corresponding period of last year we had an excess of receipts above expenditures of $52,000,000, making a difference of $90,000,000 as compared with this year. We are certain to have a large deficiency in revenue this year.

But what I especially desire to call to the attention of the Senate is the fact that there are now pending before the Senate and upon the Calendar, or soon to be there, four or five bills that involve unusual and extraordinary expenditures of more than a hundred million dollars; and I am sorry to say that one of those items of expenditure is a proposition offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], who is constantly an economist in observation, involving at least $10,000,000. I hope the Senate will seriously consider these questions of abstracting money from the Treasury of the United States by these enormous expenditures, which are sure to be made a subject of criticism. In the approaching political campaign we shall see the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and other Senators upon the other side upon the stump criticising the Republican party for their enormous expenditures—expenditures made at their suggestion and with their cooperation. I think it is quite time that we should give these questions serious consideration upon this side of the Chamber.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FORAKER. Before the Senator takes his seat——

Mr. ALDRICH. I yield to either Senator.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not know the Senator from Texas had been recognized. I yield to him.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand the question before the Senate is on the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to reconsider the vote by which the Army appropriation bill was passed. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island if he believes that the bill carries a greater appropriation than it should, and further, if he is in favor of that motion?

Mr. ALDRICH. I was discussing another phase of this question—the question of public expenditures.

Mr. CULBERSON. I observed that.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will say in explanation of the manner in which this bill comes here with these increasing appropriations made necessary by an increase in the pay of the Army, which we all voted for perhaps——

Mr. TELLER. No; not all.

Mr. ALDRICH. Well, a large majority.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if there are any repentant sinners here, I hope they will reconsider and put themselves straight.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield further to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not think it possible, I will say, as a practical question, to reconsider the Army bill and reduce the expenditures in that measure this year, but I do think that, in view of the approaching deficiency, we must stop these extraordinary and unusual expenditures of the public funds.

Mr. FORAKER. Before the Senator takes his seat——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do.

Mr. FORAKER. I wanted to ask the Senator if he would not put into the RECORD, along with his remarks about the deficiency we are likely to have for this year, the statement whether that deficiency will be due to a falling off in the revenues or to an increase of appropriations?

Mr. WARREN. Or both.

Mr. ALDRICH. Both.

Mr. FORAKER. And to what extent, if the Senator can tell us, approximately?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think I can accurately.

Mr. WARREN. I understand the Senator has it there, so that it may all be printed.

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; I will put it into the RECORD.

Mr. FORAKER. I shall be glad if the Senator will put all of that in the RECORD.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will put the statement in the RECORD.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Mr. WARREN. Before proceeding further—and I will only take a moment or two—I think I ought to put myself right as to the matter concerning which I was surprised into speaking of—the press. I am one of those who believe in the press. I do not know that any of us would be here if it were not for the press, or that we could remain here except with the support of the members of the press. I do not know what we would do without them, and many times I feel that I do not know what we are going to do with them. I do not wish to arraign any member of the press who hastens to obtain previous or unborn news, because the appetite of the people seems to be for such reading matter, and I think it finds lodgment in no place where there is more appetite for it than here in the Senate. We seem to wish to believe when we read a flamboyant article in the morning newspapers which undertakes to speak for the President of the United States or a Cabinet officer that it must be ex cathedra.

Now, in speaking of the author of this article and some publishments which he has made heretofore, he evidently has taken hints and little innuendoes and information received from Department employees and heads of Departments and has coined them into fine tales, which furnish excellent yellow reading matter, and probably he was commended by his Western newspaper and perhaps has been wired to get more of the same stuff, because that is what sells the newspapers and what the reading public seemingly wants.

As to the Army, we always love the Army in war and hate it during periods of peace. If there is any one Senator on this floor who has not arisen in his place at some time and asked something of the Army that is outside of strictly war matters, but which costs money, I hope he will rise and let us see the color of his hair. Senators rise alternately on one side and on the other, and sometimes several together, and ask that the War Department shall send surveyors and engineer officers to this State or that to look over this river or that, or where they want a river and propose to make one, so that they may get into the river and harbor bill with a big appropriation.

That is all charged up to the Army, first, as to the survey, and then, when the survey is made, the Army is called upon to furnish the engineers and to furnish the gray matter with which to execute all of this great commercial work, which is not at all a matter of war. It is a matter of civil government and improvement. The matter of improving our rivers and harbors is a part of the general commerce of the country; yet our Army does it.

Mr. HALE. That is not in this bill.

Mr. WARREN. The engineers are not?

Mr. HALE. The rivers and harbors.

Mr. WARREN. The Engineer Corps furnishes, as I said before, the brains, and the brawn, too, for that matter, for all this work, and they are in this bill. The engineers are a part of the Army, and the appropriations for them are in the bill. If we have an earthquake, we call upon the Army to go and protect the property and clean up. We call upon the Army for more than 600 of its officers in continual service at our State and district military and other schools and colleges throughout the country to teach at such schools. We are not only providing for the Army, but we are providing for the great body politic. We are providing for the militia of the several States and Territories. We are providing for a possible larger Army in case of war.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Just at that point I want to ask the Senator a question. He is chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and I think can answer it.

He spoke of the case of a future war. If we should have a war, I will ask the Senator whether we have now available more than 65,000 regulars and 145,000 militiamen, not trained for the field, and whether, in his judgment, the present military establishment, if war should come, would be adequate to any kind of a defense against even one army corps of trained and equipped troops in the field?

Mr. WARREN. It would not, located as our Army is.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to ask the Senator upon that point another question, which is, whether in the matter of equipment, the fundamentals of a fight, such as ammunition and other munitions of war, we are, with our present establishment, equipped to maintain a campaign for a single month against a single army corps?

Mr. WARREN. In answer to that——

Mr. GALLINGER. Where?

Mr. HALE. I wish the Senator would tell us where he expects this imaginary army corps is going to get into this country?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have not said anything about any imaginary army corps. The Senator referred to a future war. I will ask the Senator whether or not he thinks a future conflict is impossible to this country?

Mr. HALE. Practically.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Practically impossible?

Mr. HALE. Yes; practically impossible.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then the Senator from Maine would be in favor, I take it, logically—if the Senator from Wyoming will permit me—of dismantling our present military establishment?

Mr. HALE. I would have only a sufficient military establishment—not one soldier more than we have at present—and would add nothing whatever to it. The Senator will never see any war.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I sincerely hope not.

Mr. HALE. And I hope he will live many years of usefulness. This talk and this worry and this imaginary idea that any nation is ever going to invade our shores is to me nothing but sheer nonsense.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator can address himself upon that subject to the chairman of the Military Committee. It was the chairman of the Military Committee who first suggested what I suppose is in the mind of every Senator when he thinks about our military establishment or its increase. The Senator who is chairman of the Military Committee referred to the future possibility of conflict. I wish myself, if the Senator from Wyoming will permit me a moment, that I could agree with the Senator from Maine upon that subject.

I have not studied it—of course, the Senator has—but this I do know, that the Senator's beatific views are at variance with the views of a large number of very able, careful, cautious, and conservative men of the same careful judgment as that which distinguishes the Senator from Maine. And this other thing should be noted, Mr. President, at this juncture, that we never yet have gone into a conflict, except only one, where the lack of preparedness did not sacrifice hundreds of millions of dollars more than the appropriations would have been adequately to prepare us for the conflict, as well as sacrifice tens of thousands of lives.

I ask again the question that I asked when the Senator from Maine interrupted me, whether or not, with reference to the mere munitions of war, not only with reference to our troops in case of the untoward and unfortunate contingency of conflict, we have enough munitions of war to maintain a single campaign for a single month against a single army corps in case we did have a conflict?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I am about to make a confession, in answer to that question, which I would not make if the conditions as I will state them had not been already partially remedied. There came to a subcommittee of this Senate a bill from another place that provided ammunition for fortifications in a certain part of the United States. It was stated by the Department that the amount allowed for this place would provide ammunition enough for only fifteen minutes for the mortars and not to exceed thirty minutes for the guns, and there would be no ammunition within hundreds of miles with which to replenish the supply. I will say that that matter has been partially remedied by our proposing to increase the allowance fourfold.

Mr. President, as to future wars, I do not expect them, but it is the unexpected that happens. We to-day have, I think—and somebody will correct me if I am wrong—the smallest standing army in the world, unless it be China or Switzerland—I mean a per capita army.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Oh, Mr. President, per capita we have far and away the smallest standing army in the world. There is no comparison; there is only contrast. Even in the Republic of Switzerland, which by reason of its position as a neutral state is, indeed, practically immune from war, the standing army per capita, I understand, is far greater than our own. Anybody can tell by referring to the Statesman's Year Book. If I am wrong, I will try to correct it later on.

Mr. WARREN. At any rate, I am sorry that the Senator has spoiled my exception, as the exception proves the rule, it is said; but the statement of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] stands—that the United States has the smallest standing army per capita of any nation.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Except only China.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is naturally better protected.

Mr. WARREN. It is naturally better protected in some respects and worse in others. I do not state this as any argument why we should generally increase the Army at present, nor do I commit myself to that; but I say, as we go along, that when you come to figure up the demands that are made upon the Army, it is a much smaller army than it appears at first blush. Of course, when a man has eaten a hearty meal he is not hungry, and when Senators all about us have had the War Department at their command to survey their rivers and in consequence secure larger appropriations for rivers and harbors, and have had a part of the Army ordered there to build and take care of the improvements, it is quite natural to kick a little about the expenditures, notwithstanding they have received the benefit.

The Senator who usually sits at my left [Mr. CLAPP]—I do not see him in the Chamber now—registered a few moments ago a vow against the Army, and desired that a vote should be taken on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Army appropriation bill was passed, so as to show his disgust and disapproval of the Army and a desire to cut it down; yet he is interested and engaged at the present in the consideration of an appropriation bill for Indian affairs, and the Chief of that Department is knocking at the door of the War Department for certain troops to be sent to one of the posts out in Wyoming which the War Department had abandoned. They proposed to resist the demand, but they have finally been overcome by the Indian Office setting forth the great terror that it claims exists there; that there may be hundreds of innocent people slaughtered, and so forth. Yet he decries the Army while calling upon it to do unusual duty in protecting citizens against his wards that he has especially in charge.

Now, Mr. President, the Army is called upon to guard the public parks and grounds. You can not obtain a water right at the Falls of Niagara without going to the War Department; you can not build a bridge anywhere across a navigable stream without the permission of the War Department. It has charge of the navigable waters; it has charge of all rivers and harbors; it furnishes officers, as I said before, to every school in this country that is willing to accept military instruction for its pupils. It seems to me therefore that there is something besides provision for war purposes contained in the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. I would remind the Senator that there are many Army officers employed on the Panama Canal.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, but the Panama Canal is a small matter compared with the great amount of work done by the Army. It is just one of the little incidents, but we have to take that into consideration.

Now, as to the Secretary of War and as to the War Department urging the increase of the Army up to 140,000 or 150,000 men, as this article in this morning's Post represents, as I said before, I have never heard of it, and I have been in frequent conference with the Secretary of War over Army matters. We have had him before the Committee on Military Affairs, and he has not even hinted at the necessity at the present time of increasing the Army to any such extent as this newspaper article indicates. But I should think very much less of that Secretary of War, and I should think very much less of his aids and of the General Staff, if they did not look far enough into the future so as to arrange figures and tables and proportions in order that, if we should be surprised into any unfortunate war, the preparations for war in the Department should be up-to-date.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator from Wyoming if my memory is at fault when I am laboring under the impression that the Secretary of War did in a recent speech, either in Chicago or Omaha, state that he desired a very large increase in the Army of the United States?

Mr. WARREN. Well, I can not say what the Senator might have seen in the newspapers. I did not happen to see it, I will say.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think if the Senator will examine the newspaper files he will discover that such a suggestion was recently made. I do not think I can be mistaken about it.

Mr. WARREN. Possibly so, or possibly it might have been a review. It might have been the headlines.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I speak of the Secretary's speech. I had no expectation that this would result in so lengthy a discussion over an article by a newspaper correspondent. That is one reason why I suggested that the article in the Washington Post struck me as being inspired, aside from the explicit declaration that the newspaper man himself made. I may be mistaken about it, but I have in mind the recollection of an utterance of that kind recently made by the distinguished Secretary of War.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I presume that the correspondent had sufficient basis for any real live, energetic, sensational newspaper man to hang a report upon, because I presume that somewhere in the Department, in the staff, perhaps, there are figures of that kind being made, but I certainly shall ask, with a good deal of confidence, the Senate to believe that the President of the United States is not backward about communicating with us, nor are his chiefs of Department. If the President of the United States or the Secretary of War had desired any action on the part of Congress toward doubling the Army, it seems to me that we should have had some communication in an official way.

Mr. GALLINGER. But I think the Senator ought to be a little more frank about that. I assume this has reference to the future, not to the present year, and that we are being prepared for this new programme. That is the way it struck me.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the country will be great enough and will be rich enough eventually so that we will feel we ought to have an Army as large as that, I will say to the Senator, and in saying that, I do not commit myself as to the size of an Army or say what I will vote for if a bill comes up. I was not in the Chamber when the Senator from Maine opened his remarks.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WARREN. In a moment. I was not certain what was the motion that brought this matter up, but I understand now that the Senator from Maine will withdraw a motion to reconsider. I wish to say that so far as the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is concerned, I am perfectly willing that the Senate may reconsider the vote whereby the appropriations were made.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will ask the Senator from Wyoming if it is not generally understood that the information this writer gives to the country is obtained from reliable sources?

Mr. WARREN. From what the Senator said yesterday I should think there may be such erroneous belief.

Mr. OVERMAN. The information he evidently got from the Attorney-General, to which I referred yesterday. I wish to ask the Senator another question. I understand that there are only about 45,000 soldiers now, whereas there is a limit of 65,000. Am I correct?

Mr. WARREN. That is relatively true.

Mr. OVERMAN. The appropriation is made for the whole Army?

Mr. WARREN. The appropriation for 1909 is made large enough, with the hope——

Mr. OVERMAN. Of its growing somewhat.

Mr. WARREN. That the Army will probably be filled to the present limit, which is over 60,000 men and officers.

Mr. OVERMAN. And if the Army is not filled to the limit, then the money is returned?

Mr. WARREN. The unused money, as I stated earlier today, will revert to the Treasury.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have no disposition to take part in the discussion so far as it relates to the act, or alleged act, of any particular officer of the Government. In fact, if I had any disposition, the thinly veiled but evidently political turn which it has taken among our friends on the other side in their scarcely concealed family dispute, would warn me that in venturing in I would be trespassing upon ground where I did not belong. So I wish to disclaim anything in what I have said or what I may say as having any reference to any particular officer of the Government, or taking any part in their domestic differences.

In fact, Mr. President, I only rose for the purpose of replying to what needs a reply, because the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] named me—not simply referring to measures that I am interested in, or which I have advocated, but specifically naming me.

I want to call attention, Mr. President, to the fact that the Senator from Rhode Island introduced this particular feature of the discussion in connection with the alleged necessity for economy, while urging that we should not pay out the money of the Government when in so doing it would result in a deficiency and when it may be needed for other purposes, and contending that there should not be appropriations of an extraordinary character which, as he said, will carry the appropriations to over $100,000,000 in excess of what they will be for the ordinary needs of the Government.

Mr. President, that would seem necessarily to involve the proposition that the particular measure with which he couples my name was a measure in which there was sought to be collected from the Government either an alleged debt or contested claim, or to secure an appropriation for some purpose which could be honorably and properly and justly denied by the Government.

But, Mr. President, the particular measure the Senator mentioned, and with which he connected my name, is not one of a claim against the Government on account of which an alleged indebtedness arises, and the correctness of which may be properly contested, but it is simply the proposition that the Government shall return to those who legally own it something which does not belong to it, and which the Government is holding under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States not as its own property, but simply in trust for those to whom it belongs.

I have here the volume of the Supreme Court decisions in which that particular ruling is made—not by any inferior court, but by the Supreme Court of the United States—in a decision pronounced by Chief Justice Chase, in which he says that this money does not belong to the Government, that it never did belong to the Government, and that the Government never intended in taking possession of it to deny it to those to whom it properly belongs.

I wish to read in the hearing of the Senator from Rhode Island the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, if I may have his attention. The Senator is urging economy and urging that the Government shall have the use of funds, including funds which, according to the highest tribunal in this land, do not belong to the Government.

In discussing the question whether or not the Government should return it to those to whom it belongs, Chief Justice Chase, speaking for the court, uses this language——

Mr. ALDRICH. What year was that?

Mr. BACON. The year of the decision?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

Mr. BACON. It was in the term of 1871, and I presume that is the year of the decision. Chief Justice Chase—and I beg the Senator from Rhode Island to give heed to this language; I want the Senator from Rhode Island to hear it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am listening.

Mr. BACON. No; the Senator is not listening. I do not at all wonder that the Senator is not willing to hear it, and I do not at all wonder that anyone would be unwilling to hear it who objects to the payment of this money.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BACON. I will for a question.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have been a member of the Senate for twenty-seven years, and I have heard that citation made in every Congress since I have been a member of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. The more reason why the Senator should endeavor not to hear it again, because every time he hears it it must hurt him badly, taking the position he does that the Government should refuse to pay over this money. But I will read it now. Speaking of the duty of the Government of the United States to return this money to those to whom they say it belongs and to whom it only belongs, Chief Justice Chase, speaking for the court, uses this language in the Klein case:

> To refuse it would be a breach of faith not less "cruel and astounding" than to abandon the freed people whom the Executive had promised to maintain in their freedom.

The Chief Justice of the United States, Chief Justice Chase, could hardly have used language which was intended or which could have had the power to express more forcibly the duty of the Government in this particular.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. The Chief Justice in the case of Haycroft v. The United States, cited in 22 Wallace, some years after, giving expression to the statement the Senator has read there, in speaking of this money, did not apply it in the general term in which the Senator now expresses it, but said:

> And again (page 139), that "the proceeds of the property have passed into the possession of the Government, and the restoration of the property is pledged to none except those who have continually adhered to the Government."

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. HOPKINS. Making the point clear and distinct that it belonged only to those who came within the limitations of the law that was passed in 1863.

While I am upon my feet, I desire to call the Senator's attention——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator wishes to discuss the question he possibly had better discuss it in his own time. I am perfectly willing to yield to the Senator for the purpose of answering an inquiry.

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not desire to discuss it at any length on this occasion. I simply wanted to correct the Senator on that point, and if the Senator will allow me upon one other point, while I am on my feet——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield further to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HALE. I ask the Senator from Georgia to yield to me. I am called from the Chamber.

Mr. BACON. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. BURKETT. Before the Senator from Maine withdraws the motion——

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Maine can not withdraw it at this time. I am discussing it before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia object?

Mr. BACON. I do, until I finish what I have to say.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. BACON. The Senator sat still and heard the Senator from Rhode Island make an attack specifically upon this proposition and name me particularly, and now the Senator avails himself of my courtesy in yielding to him the floor to allow him to make an inquiry or suggestion with regard to this discussion for the purpose of withdrawing the motion in order that it may end what I have to say.

Mr. HALE. I do not want to interfere with the Senator from Georgia. I am called necessarily from the Senate, and I wanted to make the formal withdrawal. Of course the Senator understands that an appropriation bill is coming right up, and he can discuss this question and any other question upon that just the same as upon this. I can not stay here.

Mr. BACON. I am replying to what has been said to me in this discussion.

Mr. HALE. I desire to withdraw the motion, and then the Senator can go on if he chooses.

Mr. BEVERIDGE (to Mr. HALE). You do not take him off his feet.

Mr. HALE. I do not take the Senator off his feet. I do not want to take him off his feet.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BACON. I yield.

Mr. TELLER. I want to say that, under the rules of the Senate, no Senator can be taken off the floor before he concludes by withdrawing what is before the Senate. That is the rule which has ever been in force here.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly; I understand that. I can not withdraw the motion if the Senator objects.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Georgia has a right to proceed in his own right until he gets through.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia has that right. The Chair asked the Senator from Georgia if he would yield to the Senator from Maine. The Chair understood the Senator from Georgia said that he would. The Senator from Maine then asked leave to withdraw the motion. The Chair understood the Senator from Georgia to object to the withdrawal. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion can not be withdrawn except by leave.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. HALE. I do not think when no Senator is on the floor that I would then be forbidden to withdraw my motion. I can do that. But, of course, I can not take the Senator off the floor, and it is only by his consent that I could withdraw it.

Mr. BACON. I do not understand that the Senator from Maine could have had any other object in making the motion except to take me off the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BACON. I do, with great pleasure.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am willing to withdraw my allusion to the Senator from Georgia if that will simplify matters.

Mr. BACON. I have no doubt the Senator finds the discussion extremely unpleasant to him and that he would be glad of anything that would efface it, but I do not intend that the Senator shall have that opportunity.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, if the Senator from Georgia will allow me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BACON. I yield to the Senator from Illinois for the purpose of a question, but not for the purpose of replying at this time to me, because the Senator can do that in his own time.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will state that the purpose of the interruption is to call the Senator's attention to the fact that there is no separate fund in the Treasury known as the "cotton fund;" that if the claim, as the Senator has presented it, should be passed by Congress appropriations would have to be made to meet it the same as appropriations are made to meet the requirements for the support of the Army or the Navy; and that the Secretary of the Treasury a few years ago stated that the only amount of money now that is in the Treasury received from abandoned and captured cotton is cotton that was taken from the Confederate Government.

Mr. BACON. The Senator can state that in his own time.

Mr. HOPKINS. Very well.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will have an ample opportunity.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia declines to yield further to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HALE. I only wish to make a suggestion. Does the Senator object to my making the request, as I am called from the Chamber, that at the close of his remarks——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do object. The Senator can leave with any other Senator the authority to withdraw the motion for him at the proper time. I do not think that at a time when a Senator is discussing the matter it is proper that it should be now interjected.

Mr. HALE. I was only going to suggest that it should be done when the Senator was through.

Mr. BACON. I would have been through long since if Senators had not interrupted me.

Mr. BURKETT. I will say to the Senator from Maine that——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BACON. Very well.

Mr. BURKETT. Before the motion is withdrawn I want to have an opportunity to say a few words.

Mr. HALE. Well, let the matter go.

Mr. BACON. Now, Mr. President, I did not rise for the purpose of any elaborate discussion of the question at this time. I only rose because the Senator from Rhode Island had specified a particular matter now before the Senate, and not merely before it, but which is pending as the unfinished business, and had pointed out as a matter of extravagance a proposition which I favor, and had, I think, done me the probably undeserved honor of saying that I was a great advocate of economy. I am afraid I am not as much so as I should be, and I am rather inclined to think that Senators on the other side of the Chamber will recognize the fact that it was an undeserved compliment which the Senator from Rhode Island paid me at that time.

But I wish to say that the Senator from Rhode Island, assuming to speak in the interest of the Government and for the conservation of its resources, pointed out the fact that there would be probably a deficiency, and that he advocated as one means by which that deficiency could be avoided, in part at least, that the Government should keep money and use money which the Supreme Court of the United States had solemnly said did not belong to the Government; that the Senator from Rhode Island desired to put the Government of the United States in the position of a man who had in his pocket money that the Supreme Court had decided was not his, and who, in spite of such decision, would continue to maintain his style and his luxury by the use of another man's money rather than pay it over to the rightful owner, when he knew that there was no possible appeal from the final decision of the fact that the money did not belong to him. That is the position the Senator from Rhode Island is willing and urges that the Government of the United States shall occupy.

It matters not, Mr. President, that this money had been covered into the Treasury; the fact as stated by the Senator from Illinois is known to us all. It is no new fact, it is not discovery on the part of the Senator from Illinois, that while this fund does not belong to the Government of the United States, it has been mixed with a general fund. That does not change the proposition.

Mr. President, if I were not unwilling to detain the Senate I could illustrate what is the rule of law where a trustee mingles the property of a cestui que trust with his own funds. Does that relieve him of the responsibility or does it increase it? Every tyro in the law knows the answer to the question.

Mr. President, I do not desire to continue the discussion longer than simply to reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island that we are in a position to honestly keep up our resources by the use of those funds which the Supreme Court of the United States has solemnly said do not belong to the Government of the United States and never did belong to it, Mr. President.

The Supreme Court of the United States has said, and the words of the act of 1863 bear them out, that it was never the intention of the Government of the United States to retain this money; that they gathered it in the fortunes and the necessities of war, and that as the Army progressed and property without claimants there on the ground fell into the hands of the Army, it was taken possession of in order that it might be preserved and that in due time and in a proper way it might be restored to those who were entitled to it.

It is true that in the beginning, under the act of 1863, it was provided that it should be restored only to those who had been loyal to the Government. But afterwards, under the general amnesty which was promulgated by the proclamation of the President of the United States, under this decision of the Supreme Court of the United States every man who fell within the clemency of that proclamation was entitled to the benefits of that act.

Can that be reversed? Has there even been an attempt of the Government of the United States to secure a rehearing by the Supreme Court of the United States to reverse it?

No wonder, Mr. President, that Senators are familiar with the facts of these cases, because while the learned Senator from Rhode Island has been here for twenty-seven years this question has been here for forty years; and for forty years Senators sitting on that side of the Chamber have denied to the people that which the Supreme Court of the United States, with not a man on the court from the section particularly interested, have decided did not belong to the Government of the United States, but that it belonged to the original owners. Senators, I say, during those forty years have sat here and denied this act of justice in the face of the decision of the Supreme Court finally and forever settling the question of right.

Mr. President, I have said to one of them this morning in private conversation that I was astonished at him, and I am astonished at him—a small matter as it is compared to other expenditures before us, a small matter as it is compared to other claims which are recognized by the Government continually, and a matter which, whether great or small, is one in which the right has been finally adjudicated by the Supreme Court.

Mr. President, there are tender women and dependent children to-day, the daughters and the grandchildren of the people to whom this money originally belonged and to whom it belonged during their lives, who to-day are suffering because of the fact that the Government of the United States—the great, wealthy Government of the United States—has in its coffers, and refuses to deliver up, $5,000,000 that the Supreme Court of the United States says does not belong to the Government and does belong to these people. Am I excused in saying that I am astonished that any Senator will sit in his seat in the face of this decision and say that he does not think that that money ought to be paid out to those to whom it belongs?

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. I hold in my hand a report of the committee of this body showing that in the Fifty-fifth, Fifty-sixth, Fifty-seventh, and Fifty-eighth Congresses it recommended this bill favorably to the Senate after a thorough investigation, and I hold a very able report in my hand by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] giving all the facts and the opinion on the subject.

Mr. BACON. Not only so, Mr. President, but in addition to those Senate reports, in four Congresses, four committees of the House of Representatives, twice the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives, twice the Committee on War Claims of the House of Representatives, have, after a most careful consideration and examination, reported solemnly to the House of Representatives that this money was in the Treasury of the United States and did not belong to the Government of the United States, but does belong to these people; and then, as stated by the Senator from North Carolina, four reports from four committees of this body, one of them made by my honored friend the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], four separate reports without a dissenting voice, not simply saying the Government of the United States ought to pay the claimants, not simply saying that it was a debt that the Government owed, but saying positively and specifically in the language of the Supreme Court of the United States that the Government of the United States has money in its Treasury vaults that does not belong to it.

Why, Mr. President, it is bad enough when the Government of the United States refuses to pay a just debt; it is bad enough when it turns a deaf ear to a just claim where there may be some ground for contention; but how does it comport with the dignity and the credit and the honor of the Government of the United States to have within its coffers and refuse to deliver to its owners money that the supreme tribunal of the country has said does not belong to it? That is the ground on which we appeal to Senators.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. MONEY. By the courtesy of the Senator from Georgia, I want to address the Senate on this subject for a few moments only.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I have said as much as I want, and the Senator can have the floor.

Mr. MONEY. Thank you.

I do not intend, Mr. President, to take up the legal or judicial side of this controversy. I think I have read a hundred times all the literature connected with this case, all the decisions of the Court of Claims and of the Supreme Court of the United States. I know the legislative history of it. I have read every solitary report that has ever been made, and there never has been a minority report. I have introduced this bill ever since I have been in the Senate one term after another. I fought for it when I was in the House twenty-five years ago, and Judge Culberson, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, made upon it what I considered one of the ablest reports that I ever read in my life on any subject.

I do not intend to speak to the honorable Senators as to what the Supreme Court says as to whether this is or is not public money or private trust funds, but I want to say something for the honor of the United States of America, perhaps the greatest Government in the world, and, being governed by its own citizens, it should be the best Government in the world. I want to say, gentlemen, that when you deny the authority of the Supreme Court that is well enough; let it go; but when you come to consider the position in which you place this Government to which you owe allegiance, and whose honor you have sworn to protect, you say that you will place the United States in the rank of robbers and thieves, which you do by your action in this matter.

For two hundred years or more no international law or laws of war have permitted any hostile army to plunder private citizens on land. That has been outlawed centuries ago. No government to-day that claims a civilization has for more than two hundred years ever captured the private property of people on land during the progress of war.

And I want to say that the United States of America has covered herself with imperishable glory in the affairs of nations by attempting to have this beneficent rule of action in time of war transferred to the high seas and to make private property at sea just as sacred as it has been for over two centuries on land. The convention at Paris in 1856 was not signed by the United States and Spain. Alone of all the thirty-six signatories to that convention they refused to sign for what reason? The United States, through her delegates at that convention, intended to enforce upon nations as their law that private property should be respected at sea as well as on land. It was not admitted by that convention, and consequently the United States of America, followed by Spain, refused to sign that convention, but declared privateering piracy.

Now, that is the glorious history of the United States, and here are these gentlemen who would put us in the ignoble attitude of having plundered private persons and private property in time of war, of having brought to her strong box the money that belongs to other people, and are now holding it with the tenacity of death itself, for fear the rightful owners will come in possession of it.

It is a shameful attitude in which the Government of the United States is being placed to-day by her servants. This Government can not afford to do wrong to anyone anywhere on the broad globe where the shining sun looks down upon it; much less can it afford to plunder the wretched, the miserable, and the poor.

Since when has the ignoble doctrine entered in the minds of men sitting in this Chamber? I recollect hearing a distinguished gentleman on that side say that this is the last little bit of booty which the United States asks. Is the United States to be classed with the wretched scroundrels who lingered between the flags of both armies and pillaged with equal hand both friend and foe?

Gentleman, you can not afford to do it. If you can do it, the Government of the United States can not afford to follow the action which you apply. This is a just demand. The Supreme Court has decided in tones that can not be mistaken nor misrepresented by any decision that may be quoted here. Look at the Klein case, the Armstrong case, the Pargoud case, the Padelford case, and any other number of cases where the court decided that the amnesty proclamation wiped away every sin of rebellion and that the claimant stood exactly in the attitude of those who had been strictly loyal during the war and who had already recovered over $9,000,000 of this money.

Now, gentlemen, I have nothing more to say on the subject, but I hope the Senator from Georgia will succeed in his efforts to have consideration at this time.

Mr. FRYE. At the request of my colleague [Mr. HALE], I move to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NELSON. I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 415) regulating the settlement of the accounts between the United States and the several States relative to the disposition of the public lands, and for other purposes.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to have the unfinished business laid aside.

Mr. GAMBLE. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FRYE. I renew my motion.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. FRYE. I move that the motion to reconsider, made by my colleague, and I do it at his request, be laid on the table.

Mr. BURKETT. I will ask the Senator from Maine to yield.

Mr. FRYE. I think this discussion has been profitless and has been long enough in all conscience.

Mr. BURKETT. It has been all one-sided, I will say to the Senator from Maine.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine insist on his motion? It is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine to lay on the table the motion made by his colleague to reconsider the vote by which the Army appropriation bill passed. [Putting the question.] The "noes" seem to have it. The "noes" have it.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President——

Mr. FRYE. I shall renew the motion as soon the Senator from Nebraska finishes his speech.

Mr. BURKETT. I will say to the Senator I am very much obliged to him. I shall take but a minute or two, but I want to submit to the Senate that the motion that has just been made, together with the motion which it is sought to lay upon the table and the discussion that has been had upon this question, is not one entirely in keeping with the high character of this great body.

If, sir, a young member of this body or a member of the minority of this body had made that motion to reconsider and had followed it up with the character of addresses that have been made here to-day, it might have been overlooked, but for a man of the standing and the character of the Senator who made the motion to make it and then at once serve notice that as soon as he had offered some remarks upon it he proposed to withdraw it, anybody who reads his remarks will observe that the motion was not made in good faith, but was made that the purpose for which his remarks were made might be carried out.

That motion was made for one single purpose, in my opinion, from what followed, and that was to furnish an opportunity to criticise some particular man who is just now attracting some attention in this country. The very remark and insinuation that the Secretary of War was called away from his office frequently and prolonged, and so forth, carried with it an insinuation that no member of this body, it seems to me, should attribute to a man occupying that distinguished position.

Then, also, quoting from this particular article, which had no bearing whatever on the appropriation bill or the consideration of it, injected into this debate a political turn that, in my opinion, neither the Senator from Maine nor any other Senator occupying the position that he occupies has any right to inject into this debate and into this body. Then, as soon as his and other critical remarks were over, by withdrawing himself and absenting himself from the Chamber, shows that his motion was not marked by that fairness that should characterize such a motion.

Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Maine that there are some reasons for making a motion to reconsider the bill. The Army appropriation bill was reported here yesterday morning, as the RECORD shows, and yesterday afternoon it was taken up and considered with only a half dozen Senators on the floor. It followed a long discussion on some other bills that were not of very much interest to a great many Senators. When the 5 per cent bill was up notice was practically served that that was to occupy the afternoon. I took some pains to make inquiry at the time I left the Chamber after 2 o'clock. There was a long report being read. Senators in general understood that the reading of reports and the discussion was to occupy the afternoon. Then at a time when there were very few members in the Senate the Army appropriation bill was taken up and passed.

I speak as one member. I had some amendments I would have been glad to offer to the bill. There are no doubt others who would have offered amendments if they had been here. The bill went through without the consideration that it should have had.

Now, when the Senator from Maine made his motion to reconsider the bill it was certainly a very proper motion if he had put it in good faith, and as I rather thought the Senator was making the motion when he first made it. I am certain the Senate would have agreed with him and perhaps would have reconsidered it and given opportunity for a reconsideration of any matters that went into the bill. After occupying the whole morning hour with a continued and prolonged talk, which simply amounted to a political assault upon a political candidate in the country, then simply withdrawing the motion and withdrawing himself from the Chamber, it seems to me does not mark the candor and fairness that ought to characterize the action of the Senator from Maine.

The morning hour has passed. At the beginning of it we have our resolutions and our bills and our reports, and so forth. The Senator comes in and injects business that is entirely foreign to the business of the Senate and criticises a great Department of the Government.

Now, let me just make a suggestion, and I am through. The increases for the Army and the Navy that have been made here in the years that are past, and they have been very great and they are alarming, I may say, for I can remember that ten years ago when I came to Congress I think our Navy appropriation bill amounted only to something like $25,000,000. To-day it is four times that many millions of dollars. The appropriation bills are increasing, but let me say to the Senator that if this bill is wrong, if it is an increase out of proportion to what it ought to be, there is no member who is more responsible for it than the Senator from Maine. He, like any other Senator on the floor, has the right to raise a question at the time the bill is being considered.

The Senate and the other branch of Congress are responsible for the appropriation bills. The Secretary of War is not responsible. He is at the head of that great Department. It is his duty, and those who are serving under him, to prepare for Congress the estimates for the Army and to keep pace perhaps with the growth and development of this great Republic; and because in response to their duty, in response to the enthusiasm you might call it that naturally characterizes any man who is devoted to a specific line of work, they make the estimates larger than they ought to be, that is no reason why Congress should appropriate more money than ought to be appropriated.

So I say it comes with poor grace from a Senator occupying the position the distinguished Senator from Maine does, to criticise the head of a great Department, and to criticise him in practically a political way, I may say, to criticise him for that for which the Secretary of War has never been responsible in any shape or manner.

If any of the funds that Congress has appropriated from year to year have ever been misappropriated by the Department, if there has been a leakage in the amount of money, if there have been any false accounts rendered, if there has been any maladministration of the law by the Department, we can well afford to hold up the chief of the Department for wrongdoing before this body and the country, but with the increased appropriations for that Department the head of that Department has nothing more to do than to submit at the beginning of each session of Congress what is desired by the Army for the building up of the Army, keeping pace with the growth and development of the country.

When the present Secretary of War came into the administration of the War Department it was when after a long number of years the Army appropriations had been increasing year by year. He had a right to suppose that as Congress year by year had kept up that increase it would keep up that self-same gradual increase to meet the requirements of a growing Republic. He made the recommendation. If Congress is dissatisfied with it, it is the duty of Congress and it is in the power of Congress to reduce the estimates whenever Congress wants it done.

I submit that it is altogether improper for this branch of the Government to criticise another branch of the Government for a thing that this Department of the Government has under its control, but it is more highly improper to criticise it in the manner of the criticism that has been lodged against the Secretary of War this afternoon.

Mr. President, it is all well and good to go to the country with a criticism of the work of our Army. I am not one of those who ever believed in a great standing Army to compare in any measure or manner with some of the great standing armies of the world. It has been brought out here to-day that we have the smallest Army in all the world. In fact, as those familiar with the matter know, we have scarcely enough of an Army to-day to attend to the duties that are required of the Army as imposed upon it by the legislative branch of the Government of the United States.

We have got it scattered everywhere, dredging rivers and dredging harbors; we have it digging canals and watching Indians; we have it in all portions of the country in development work from the Atlantic to the Pacific and even in some of the islands of the sea. They have all that work to do, which is imposed by the legislative branch of this Government, and I submit that it is not a proper thing to do to come in here and make this criticism upon a Department that is simply carrying out the work that Congress has laid out for that Department to do.

So I say that if this bill is wrong the Senator owes it to this body and to himself to insist on his motion to reconsider, and then to point out the errors, or else, by withdrawing his motion, he is convincing all of us that he never did offer it in good faith and never did intend to press it and never wanted to reconsider the bill, and he did not care whether he was here yesterday when the bill was considered or not, but that he simply made the motion to get up here and to lampoon and lambast some other Department of the Government.

I say a Senator occupying the position he does owes it more to himself and to the Senate than to occupy our time in calling the attention of the country to sins of omission or commission, or whatever they may be, of a certain Department of the Government, and then, having done it, to withdraw the motion and retire from the Chamber.

So I submit in his absence to his colleague that in my opinion his colleague owes to himself more than to take this precipitate action.

If these things are wrong, let the distinguished Senator rise here and criticise them, and if the appropriation ought to be reduced, tell us why it should be reduced, and if it ought not to be reduced, let us say so; but let it not go out to the world as if some great wrong had been perpetrated here, and get behind a motion or something of that kind and then not be willing to stand up here and point out anything wrong.

The pay has been raised of the officers and men, and that accounts, perhaps, for nine or ten million dollars in the bill. It may be wrong in the judgment of some members of this body. If it is we have a right to express an opinion against it; but neither the Senator who made this motion nor the other Senators who have spoken would stand up here and say that in their opinion it was wrong to raise the pay of the officers and the men of the Army.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I do not think that the criticism made by the Senator upon my colleague for making the motion to reconsider and then immediately withdrawing is at all just.

My colleague made the motion to reconsider, and it has been pending now for two hours. He did not ask leave to withdraw it until nearly two hours had been occupied with discussion, not of the Army appropriation bill, but of almost everything else.

I now renew the motion, at his request, to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves that the motion entered by his colleague [Mr. HALE] to reconsider the vote by which the Army appropriation bill was passed be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

FOREST SERVICE RECEIPTS.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I send to the Secretary's desk a resolution for which I ask present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Idaho, for which he asks present consideration, will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to send to the Senate classified and detailed reports of all receipts by the Forest Service during the year 1907. Also to furnish the Senate with full information as to all money on hand on July 1, 1907, on account of the Forest Service, giving the source from which such money was received; and, further, to report all sums of money received on account of the Forest Service since July 1, 1907, and from what source such money was received, and what money has been paid into the Treasury of the United States on account of the Forest Service, and to classify the same.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think a word of explanation is due.

Mr. President, at the last session of Congress it was provided in the agricultural appropriation bill as follows:

Provided, That hereafter on or before the 1st day of January of each year the Secretary of Agriculture shall submit to Congress classified and detailed reports of all receipts by the Forest Service and classified and detailed estimates of all expenditures intended for this Service for the next fiscal year and detailed reports of all expenditures under any appropriation for such Service during the preceding fiscal year: Provided further, That all money received after July 1, 1907, by or on account of the Forest Service, for timber, or from any other source of forest-reservation revenue, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt.

That is a law. I have made inquiry at the office of the Secretary of the Senate and caused inquiry to be made in the other branch of Congress, and am advised that no such report has been made and that no attempt has been made to comply with this provision of the law. I have, however, found, through the courtesy of clerks having charge of some documents in the Capitol, a typewritten statement, which I have on the desk before me, without any effort at classification such as is required by the act which I have just read, which has not been printed or presented to this body at all and which was not sent to the Senate; in other words, it was not sent to Congress.

Now, I am going to ask not only that this resolution be adopted, but I am going to follow it by asking that a portion of this document which I have be printed, and then I will ask that the resolution be submitted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Idaho.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have on my desk a statement which on its face purports to be "Expenditures of the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1907, prepared under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture by A. Zappone, chief of the division of accounts and disbursements," and then the table of contents. Among the contents of this document, which has not been printed at all, I ask that the part commencing on page 348 and extending to page 452, inclusive, be printed for the use of the Senate in the consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill; and I give notice that if these documents, which were required to be printed by the last appropriation bill, are not before the Senate or available when the agricultural appropriation bill comes up, there will be some cause for delay in the consideration of that appropriation bill.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. I wish to ask the Senator from Idaho if he will, in a general way, make a statement as to what is contained in the document that he asks to have printed?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is a typewritten statement which is sent by the Department of Agriculture, containing in an unorganized form a statement, I presume, of all of the employees of the Forestry Service, but not so classified as was required by the act of Congress, and it, of course, would not be available for general use by being in the shape it appears upon my desk. I would say that it is not a very large document and that it will be absolutely necessary in the consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. I inquire of the Senator from Idaho what, if any, objection exists to the publication of the entire report?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have no objection to that. It covers every department of agriculture. I presume that there is a great deal of material in this report that would not be controverted or be subject to controversy; but if any Senator thinks that the whole document had better be printed, I have no objection whatever to that being done.

Mr. CARTER. I ask the Senator to modify his request so as to include the printing of the entire document.

Mr. HEYBURN. At the request of the Senator from Montana, I will enlarge my request, and ask that the entire document be printed and that it be indexed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the entire document presented by him be printed, together with an index, as a public document.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho, who has made an examination of this report, whether or not it contains items of other expenditures than salaries?

Mr. HEYBURN. It contains markedly items of traveling expenses and items of a limited class.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. The examination of it would be a large task, and I have only spent a few hours over it. I have spent some hours in an examination of it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I would like to inquire what is before the Senate, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CARTER in the chair). The question before the Senate is the request of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] that the document which he presents be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. CULBERSON. What is the document?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is a report of the Department of Agriculture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Of expenditures.

Mr. CULBERSON. Is it in answer to a Senate resolution?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am asking for a Senate resolution, and I desire that this document may be available when we are considering the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to ask, if this document from the Agricultural Department is in response to a resolution of the Senate, what is it?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not in response to a Senate resolution; neither is it in compliance with the law that we enacted at the last Congress.

Mr. CULBERSON. How much will it cost to print the document?

Mr. HEYBURN. I can not estimate. I am not familiar with estimating the cost of printing.

Mr. CULBERSON. Ought we not to have some idea, Mr. President, as to the cost of printing this document and what is in it before it is ordered to be printed?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that this is a report of the Forester and that it was sent to the House of Representatives.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is the report of the Secretary of Agriculture and necessarily includes the other.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me ask if the Senator knows whether the House document was printed?

Mr. HEYBURN. It was not printed in the House.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest to the Senator from Idaho to have the matter referred to the Committee on Printing, or to secure an estimate as to the cost; and, in addition to that, Mr. President, that some person should examine it and state in a measure what it contains. I understand the Senator from Idaho himself is not able to say what is in it. We got into some trouble a few days ago by printing a document without knowing what was in it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I can say that I know something of what is in it; and the portion that I asked originally to be printed is not very much. I hold the pages here [exhibiting] so that you may inspect them. I accepted the suggestion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] because I could not give any good reason for not accepting it. I am not especially interested in the printing of any part of the document except the few pages which I hold in my hand, and which would meet all the requirements, so far as I am interested.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I take it that this is the report in conformity, or is supposed to be in conformity, with the law that was passed last year?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think it was intended to be in conformity with that law.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President, I think if any part of the report is printed the whole of it ought to be printed.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me that all of that report ought to be printed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Ought it not go to the Committee on Printing, Mr. President?

Mr. TELLER. This class of reports we never send to the Committee on Printing. It is a report from the Department of their expenditures, and I have never known such a report sent to the Committee on Printing. They are printed nem. con.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the document presented by him be printed.

Mr. HEYBURN. With an index.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. With an index thereto attached. In the absence of objection——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I understand the Senator only requests the printing of that portion which he has in his hand.

Mr. HEYBURN. I accepted the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]. The Senator from Montana and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] have both suggested that it was quite worth while to print the entire document. My original request was only for the portion to be printed which I have indicated, but I repeat that I have accepted the suggestion of those Senators.

Mr. CULBERSON. In view of the fact that the amendment was proposed by the present occupant of the chair [Mr. CARTER], I will not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the manuscript referred to will be printed as a Senate document, together with an index.

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that when the Senate adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 19355, being the fortifications appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 19355) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California asks that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Fortifications and other works of defense," on page 1, line 11, to increase the appropriation for construction of gun and mortar batteries, Engineer Department, from $300,000 to $1,135,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 24, to increase the appropriation for construction of fire-control stations and accessories, including purchase of lands and rights of way, and for the purchase and installation of necessary lines and means of electrical communication, etc., from $270,256 to $369,891.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 2, to increase the appropriation for supplying current for power and lighting at seacoast fortifications, from $100,000 to $348,888.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thousand" and insert "and twenty-one thousand and forty-eight;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That not more than $21,048 of said amount shall be paid to any person for property at, near, or adjoining Fort Armistead, Anne Arundel County, Md.: And provided further, That no part thereof shall be so paid until such person receipts in full for all claims of every kind against the United States.

So as to make the clause read:

For the procurement or reclamation of land, or right pertaining thereto, needed for the site, location, construction, or prosecution of works for fortifications and coast defenses, $121,048: Provided, That not more than $21,048 of said amount shall be paid to any person for property at, near, or adjoining Fort Armistead, Anne Arundel County, Md.: And provided further, That no part thereof shall be so paid until such person receipts in full for all claims of every kind against the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 18, to increase the appropriation for construction of sea walls and embankments from $35,000 to $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 18, to insert:

For construction of a sea wall and fill for the protection of the military reservation at Fort Travis, Galveston, Tex., $350,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Under the Chief Signal Officer," on page 5, line 7, to increase the appropriation for operation and maintenance of fire-control installations at seacoast defenses from $50,000 to $145,578.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Armament of fortifications," on page 6, line 4, to increase the appropriation for the purchase, manufacture, and test of seacoast cannon for coast defense, including their carriages, sights, implements, equipments, etc., from $273,000 to $651,013.01.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 11, to increase the appropriation for the alteration and maintenance of the mobile artillery, including the purchase and manufacture of machinery, tools, etc., from $30,000 to $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 15, after the word "arsenals," to insert "and ammunition of older model than current may be issued for the instruction and target practice of students at the institutions to which the issue of artillery is authorized," so as to make the clause read:

For the purchase, manufacture, and test of ammunition, subcaliber tubes, and other accessories for mountain, field, and siege artillery practice, including the machinery necessary for their manufacture at the arsenals, and ammunition of older model than current may be issued for the instruction and target practice of students at the institutions to which the issue of artillery is authorized, $90,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 23, before the word "thousand," to insert "and seventy-five," so as to make the clause read:

For the alteration and maintenance of the Seacoast Artillery, including the purchase and manufacture of machinery, tools, materials necessary for the work, and expenses of the civilian mechanics and extra-duty pay of enlisted men engaged thereon, $475,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Fortifications in insular possessions, Engineer Department," on page 9, line 18, to increase the appropriation for construction of seacoast batteries in the Hawaiian Islands from $400,000 to $669,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 20, after the word "Islands," to insert "not to include Subic Bay or Olongapo," so as to make the clause read:

In the Philippine Islands, not to include Subic Bay or Olongapo, $954,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 23, to increase the total appropriation for construction of seacoast batteries in insular possessions from $1,354,000 to $1,623,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 4, after the word "Islands," to insert "not to include Subig Bay or Olongapo," so as to make the clause read:

In the Philippine Islands, not to include Subig Bay or Olongapo, $115,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 5, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seventy" and insert "one hundred and twenty-nine," so as to make the clause read:

For the construction of mining casemates, cable galleries, torpedo storehouses, cable tanks, and other structures necessary for the operation, preservation, and care of submarine mines and their accessories at the defenses of the Hawaiian Islands, $129,000, to be expended by the Engineer Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 6, to strike out:

For the procurement of one torpedo planter for the Hawaiian Islands, $175,000.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For the procurement of one torpedo planter and two launches for the Hawaiian Islands, $181,000.

For the procurement of one torpedo planter and six launches for the Philippine Islands, not to include Subig Bay or Olongapo, $193,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 20, after the word "Islands," to insert "not to include Subig Bay or Olongapo," so as to make the clause read:

For procurement or reclamation of land, or right pertaining thereto, needed for the site, location, construction, or prosecution of works for fortifications and coast defenses in the Philippine Islands, not to include Subig Bay or Olongapo, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Ordnance Department," on page 12, line 2, to increase the appropriation for the purchase, manufacture, and test of seacoast cannon for coast defense, including their carriages, sights, implements, equipments, and the machinery necessary for their manufacture at the arsenals from $704,000 to $933,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 7, before the word "fifty," to insert "two hundred and," so as to make the clause read:

For purchase, manufacture, and test of ammunition for seacoast cannon, including the necessary experiments in connection therewith, and the machinery necessary for its manufacture at the arsenals, $250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 9, after the word "artillery," to insert "and the mechanical supervision of its installation;" and in line 14, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five" and insert "twenty," so as to make the clause read:

For the alteration and maintenance of the seacoast artillery and the mechanical supervision of its installation, including the purchase and manufacture of machinery, tools, materials necessary for the work, and expenses of the civilian mechanics and extra-duty pay of enlisted men engaged thereon, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 18, before the word "Islands," to strike out "and Philippine;" and in line 19, before the word "dollars," to strike out "two hundred thousand" and insert "sixty thousand nine hundred and ninety-four," so as to make the clause read:

For the purchase of submarine mines and necessary appliances to operate them for closing the channels leading to the principal seaports of the Hawaiian Islands, $60,994.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, after line 19, to insert:

For the purchase of submarine mines and necessary appliances to operate them for closing the channels leading to the principal seaports of the Philippine Islands, not to include Subig Bay or Olongapo $328,620.

Mr. ANKENY. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee to give us a little information about the appropriation in regard to the fortifications of Puget Sound.

Mr. PERKINS. I will state to the Senator from Washington that the committee have increased the appropriations in the bill about $1,600,000 for additional fortifications on Puget Sound. After hearing the reports of various bureaus of the War Department, the Chief of Engineers, the Chief of Ordnance, the Chief of Artillery, and the Chief of the Signal Service, we have provided, as I have said, about $1,600,000 for the fortifications of Puget Sound. I think I can perhaps better answer the Senator from Washington by asking the Secretary to read a communication addressed to the committee by the Chief of Ordnance, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary proceeded to read the letter.

Mr. PILES. I suggest that in order to save time the letter be inserted in the RECORD without further reading. It is a very important matter, and we are anxious to have the letter put into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection it will be so ordered.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, what is before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] requested that a certain letter be read from the Secretary's desk, and subsequently the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] asked that it be inserted in the RECORD without further reading, and that order has been made.

Mr. PERKINS. I will state to the Senator that the letter relates principally to the fortifications on Puget Sound, and gives in detail the work that the Government is now doing at that point.

The entire letter is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ORDNANCE,
Washington, March 30, 1908.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: 1. In accordance with your request, and in continuation of my hearings had before your subcommittee in charge of the fortifications bill on the 28th instant, I have the honor to send you the following information in regard to the coast defenses of Puget Sound.

2. The board on fortifications and other defenses, commonly known as the "Endicott board," appointed in pursuance of the act of March, 1885, in making its report in 1886 did not include any defenses for this district, but as the work of fortifying the seacoast, which was commenced in accordance with the general plans of this board in 1888, proceeded it became apparent that the growing importance of Puget Sound and of the country in its neighborhood demanded an adequate defense of this sheet of water, and it is now considered, in defensive matters, one of the most important regions in the United States. Ten years ago or more the defense of the mouth of the Sound by fortifications was commenced, and considerable progress had been made with the plans which had been prepared by the Engineer Department when, in January, 1905, the National Coast Defense Board, sometimes spoken of as the "Taft board," was appointed by the President to revise the recommendations of the Endicott board in the light of the progress which had been made in the defense of the coast and of the change of ideas which had accompanied the progress in military affairs. The National Coast Defense Board recommended that the entire defenses of the district, including those which were installed or in progress at the time of the report, should consist of seven 14-inch guns, six 12-inch guns, eighteen 10-inch guns, three 8-inch guns, twenty-seven 6-inch guns, eight 5-inch guns, twenty-four 3-inch guns, and forty-eight 12-inch mortars, together with the necessary searchlights, power plants, fire-control installation, and other accessories. The total cost of this installation, exclusive of ammunition, would be something over $10,000,000.

3. Of the defenses recommended there have already been provided for in appropriations, and are either in place or under construction, four 12-inch guns, eighteen 10-inch guns, three 8-inch guns, twenty 6-inch guns, eight 5-inch guns, twenty 3-inch guns, forty 12-inch mortars, and the necessary fire control installation for these pieces, leaving still to be provided for seven 14-inch guns, two 12-inch guns, seven 6-inch guns, four 3-inch guns, eight 12-inch mortars, the fire control installation for these guns, practically all of the power plant installation, and practically all of the searchlight installation. The cost of the defenses already installed has been $5,000,000; that of those remaining to be installed is something over $5,000,000.

4. The above is exclusive of ammunition, of which the proper reserve supply for war purposes corresponding to the completed project of these defenses would cost about $3,500,000. The appropriations for ammunition for the seacoast service have been applicable to the entire United States, and their amount is such that, without partiality to the Puget Sound district, about 65 per cent of the ammunition estimated as necessary could be assigned to it.

5. It should be borne in mind that the defenses projected are coast defenses, and are intended to exclude vessels of war from the waters which they are designed to protect. Their character is such as to compel an enemy to make a landing in order to gain access to any of these waters, or the cities or other organizations on or near them. If such a landing should be made in force it would be necessary to take care of the troops thus operating by other means than these seacoast fortifications, which would not be useful against them. It should also be borne in mind that only such places are fortified as are deemed of sufficient military or commercial importance to warrant protection against attack, and that no effort is made to protect all property which might be subject to destruction by a hostile raid, but whose destruction or possession by the enemy could not exercise an important influence on the outcome of a war, or justify the enemy in putting forth expensive effort for its accomplishment. This principle is exemplified in the Puget Sound district by the projection of fortifications such as are intended only to exclude hostile vessels from the waters of the sound itself. The entrance to the sound being wide, the current and depth too great to permit the use of submarine mines, and the region being subject to fogs, the possibility of hostile ships getting past the fortifications has been considered, and in order to meet it batteries are projected farther up the sound, so that an approaching enemy might know that he would have these to deal with even after passing those at the entrance, while he would always have the hazardous risk of getting out again if he should run in under cover of a fog, leaving the fortifications at the entrance unimpaired.

6. The guns which are installed are all good, and, although the carriages upon which they are mounted are not all of the best type, they are all serviceable or can and are being made so. Nine of the 10-inch guns are on disappearing carriages, which is considered the most efficient type of mounting; the nine remaining 10-inch guns and the 12-inch guns are on barbette carriages, with which the exposure is greater and the rate of fire slower. It would be worth while to replace these barbette carriages with disappearing carriages were it not for the fact that the expense of altering the emplacements would be almost as great as that for constructing new ones. It is therefore considered proper policy to continue these barbette carriages in service, but all new guns to be installed will be upon the standard type of disappearing carriage. The mortars are all thoroughly efficient, but in order to use their full power it will be necessary to strengthen their carriages, which were designed for using the mortars at a lower power than that which they are found capable of. This is an important matter and is covered by the appropriation for the "alteration and maintenance of the seacoast artillery," which is found on page 7 of the current fortifications bill as it passed the House of Representatives, commencing with line 3. The estimate of this department under this item of appropriations was $550,000, which contemplated the distribution of the strengthening of these carriages and other work of alteration over a series of years. The estimate was reduced to $400,000 in the bill as it passed the House of Representatives. I think that this amount ought to be increased.

Very respectfully,

WILLIAM CROZIER,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Ordnance, United States Army.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, has the bill been read through?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been read through with the exception of the last paragraph, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. TELLER. If the bill has been read through and the amendments have been adopted, I want to ask the chairman of the subcommittee a question or two.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. FLINT. I merely want to offer an amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. FLINT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, after line 14, it is proposed to insert:

For the procurement of land needed for the site, location, and construction of works for fortifications and coast defenses and emplacements therefor at Point Fermin, Los Angeles County, Cal., $500,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask my colleague if he has any definite information in connection with the amendment?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLINT. In reference to the amendment I desire to say that this matter was referred by the Secretary of War to the board on fortifications. They have made a report as to the cost of fortifying this point. The amount of the estimate for fortifying Point Fermin is $975,300. At the time the report was made it was stated that the land now owned by the Government about Point Fermin was not suitable or in the right location for these fortifications. I have included in the amendment a memorandum for the purchase of additional land for putting in emplacements, and eliminated the amount of the estimate for ordnance and search lights.

Mr. TELLER. How much does the amendment propose to appropriate?

Mr. FLINT. Five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. PERKINS. I will state that no estimates were laid before the committee for this purpose. Had they been, I doubt not the committee would have favorably considered the matter. If my colleague has a recommendation from the War Department which will enable us to present the matter satisfactorily to the conferees on the part of the other House, I think the committee will not object to the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, I wish to impress upon the Senate the importance of adequately fortifying this point. The Government has been expending large sums of money in the construction of a breakwater, in deepening and generally improving the San Pedro Harbor, in order to make of it a suitable port for the accommodation of the commerce of the city of Los Angeles and contiguous territory.

The city of Los Angeles alone has a population of about 300,000 people, and in addition to this it is estimated that there are at least 200,000 more inhabitants in the rich and populous country surrounding this city within a radius of fifty miles.

It will therefore be seen that there are fully 500,000 people, millions of dollars in property, and all the improvements which the Government has made at this place, to say nothing of the now large and rapidly increasing commerce of the port, absolutely without protection of any kind from the attacks of a foreign foe, should our country become involved in another war.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, just a word. I always regret to oppose anything offered by the Senator from California [Mr. FLINT], but this bill as it came from the House carried over $8,000,000, and the Senate committee, after thoroughly examining the estimates, have increased the appropriations by $3,200,000, making the total amount carried about $11,000,000. In examining the amounts carried by previous fortification appropriation bills, I find that they have never carried even in the neighborhood of as much as this bill carries.

Mr. President, it is certainly a very serious thing to adopt an amendment carrying $500,000 without that amendment having been examined by the Committee on Appropriations. When amendments carrying great items involving large amounts are presented, they ought at least to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and that committee ought to examine them carefully and have some estimate from the Department in regard to them.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. I will advise the Senator from Georgia that, as a matter of fact, the committee did have an estimate and a report from the Board of Ordnance estimating the amount to be $975,300; but the plans and specifications had not been received at the time the committee had completed their labors.

Mr. CLAY. The estimates of the War Department on this bill amount to $38,000,000, an amount, I presume, the committee never dreamed of appropriating. If we had appropriated up to the entire estimates, this bill, instead of carrying $11,000,000, would have carried $38,000,000.

We have heard economy preached here to-day; in fact, I believe I heard the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] make his usual annual speech in favor of economy, and yet I believe that the naval appropriation bill, which comes under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which the Senator from Maine is chairman, has increased from fifteen million to one hundred million dollars since I have been in the Senate. Mr. President, it is one thing to preach economy and it is another thing to practice economy, to put into operation exactly what you talk about.

If we are going to put on this $500,000 without the Appropriations Committee examining this matter and passing upon it, there are other items, amounting to millions of dollars, which were presented and pressed before that committee and were refused that will probably be urged in the Senate.

My good friend, the Senator from California, tells us that this amendment was before the committee and that an estimate has been made for this item. The presumption is that the Committee on Appropriations did their duty, and if the Committee on Appropriations declined to accept this amendment, it is the best evidence that it ought not to be inserted in the bill.

The senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] is a member of the Committee on Appropriations. He has charge of this bill. His influence is felt in that committee every time we pass upon an appropriation bill, and if the Senator from California, with his usual energy, did not secure the insertion in this bill of this item, it is the highest evidence, in my judgment, that we ought not to agree to the amendment.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, I appeared before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, and did not ask to have this item included in the bill for the reason that the plans and specifications for this work had not then been received; but I stated to the committee that I would offer this amendment in the Senate.

Mr. CLAY. If the senior Senator from California was a member of the Committee on Appropriations that considered this bill, and if the junior Senator from California appeared before that committee, and, with the influence they possess they did not secure the placing of this item in the bill, I repeat it is the highest evidence to my mind that it ought not to go on this bill.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. The Senator keeps repeating that my influence or my colleague's influence was not able to have this item included in this bill, and I repeat to him that I did not ask to have the item put in this bill, for the reason that we did not then have the plans and specifications, and I would not ask for it until they were received.

Mr. CLAY. Does not the Senator think that an item of this kind, involving an amount of $500,000, ought to be considered by a committee and passed upon by the committee before we adopt it in the Senate? Is it not true that it is unusual, in passing upon an appropriation bill in the Senate, to adopt an item of such a large amount without consideration at the hands of the Appropriations Committee? I assure the Senator that I would be glad to see the Senator's State secure everything it needs. This bill carries $11,000,000, and about 78 per cent of this entire appropriation goes to the Pacific coast, and it is well that it should, for I realize that the Pacific coast needs more appropriations for fortifications than the remainder of the country; but we have already increased this bill nearly three and a half million dollars; and surely we ought not to increase it another half million without consideration by the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California.

Mr. TELLER. Let the amendment be again stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, after line 14, it is proposed to insert as a separate paragraph the following:

For the procurement of land needed for the site, location, and construction of works for fortifications and coast defenses and emplacements therefor at Point Fermin, Los Angeles County, Cal., $500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to ask the chairman of the subcommittee what amount the bill appropriates for the use of the Philippine Islands?

Mr. PERKINS. The bill contains an appropriation of $954,000 for the Philippine Islands.

Mr. TELLER. Does that include all the Philippine items?

Mr. PERKINS. It includes all for the Philippine Islands.

Mr. TELLER. How much to the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. PERKINS. We have increased the amount for the Hawaiian Islands $199,000. I will state to the Senator from Colorado for his information, although he is quite familiar with it, perhaps, that we have discontinued, on the recommendation of the joint military and naval board, any improvements on Subig Bay or Olongapo. The appropriations now in the bill for the Philippine Islands are as follows:

For the construction of two emplacements for two 14-inch guns on Cabello Island, Manila Bay; this is a new project; for emplacements for eight 12-inch mortars on Cabello Island, Manila Bay; for emplacement for one 10-inch gun on Corregidor Island; and to complete emplacement for 10-inch gun on Corregidor Island.

This provides for emplacements for 12-inch guns at an average of, approximately, $80,000 each. It is the plan of the Department to fortify the two islands at the entrance of Manila Bay. We made an appropriation for Corregidor two years ago, and that is nearly completed. This is to fortify the island of Cabello, 7 miles farther up on the opposite side of the bay, and it completely protects the entrance into the bay of Manila.

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission——

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. CLAY. Do I understand the Senator from California to say that this bill gives to the Philippine Islands $954,000?

Mr. PERKINS. Nine hundred and fifty-four thousand dollars for secondary batteries in Manila Bay.

Mr. CLAY. As I understand the Senator, that one item is $954,000. If I have made the calculation correctly, and I think I have, the bill carries for our insular possessions, about 72 per cent of which is for the Philippine Islands, $2,925,890.

I call the attention of the Senator to one item of $669,400 for the Hawaiian Islands. There is another item of $954,000 for the Philippines, then $20,000 for the Philippines, then $15,000, then $243,000, then $47,500, then another item of $80,000, then an item of $129,000, then $181,000 for the Hawaiian Islands, and $193,000 for the Philippines, $5,000 for the Philippines, $6,990 for the Hawaiian Islands, and $328,000 for the Philippines, making a third of the entire appropriation.

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator is mistaken in a part of his statement, I think.

Mr. CLAY. I have the bill before me, and I have taken these items from the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. In addition to the $954,000 which I have explained, we have provided for what is called a "torpedo planter"—a steamer, costing $175,000. We have provided for eight steam launches, which are torpedo planters, for the purpose of placing submarine mines and torpedoes. We have also made an appropriation for ammunition and for torpedoes and submarine mines, which, of course, increases the amount to nearly or quite the sum the Senator has stated.

The appropriation of $954,000, as I explained to the Senator from Colorado, applies to the fortification of Corregidor Island and Cebello Island, in the bay of Manila. There is no appropriation in the bill for fortifications in Subig Bay or Olongapo or any other place in the Philippine Islands, of which I have knowledge except these two islands and for the submarine mines and torpedoes to which I have referred.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I have no quarrel with this bill. I am upon the Committee on Appropriations, and we considered the bill. I have no fault to find with it. It is a moderate, modest bill.

This is to be added to the war expenses. We had before us a bill yesterday appropriating practically $100,000,000. We have a bill here to-day to add eleven or twelve million dollars more, and, with the amendments, I think about $12,000,000. We had a discussion this morning, in which I did not take any part, as to the Army appropriation bill. Somebody claimed here that our friends had taken advantage of the circumstances to attack the Secretary of War.

Mr. President, I do not suppose anyone would attack the Secretary of War on this appropriation bill, because he is like any other officer, simply carrying out the laws that we have made. A few years ago we increased the Army. The Senator from Rhode Island said he supposed we all voted for it. I wish to put in a caveat; I did not vote for it. I did not believe then and I do not believe now that we need an Army of the number we have.

But I do not think it is quite fair to complain of the committee for bringing in a bill here simply to carry out the provisions of the law that we have passed. If the Army is too big, it is not the fault of the Secretary of War nor of the Executive; it is the fault of Congress.

Of course whether the Secretary of War intends to recommend to us an increase of the Army and double the appropriations, so that next year it will be two hundred million instead of one hundred million, I do not know. But I am inclined to think he does. I think the Secretary of War on various occasions has indicated that the Army is dangerously small in his judgment. I do not know whether he is one of those who thinks that we are facing a very dangerous condition and that some nation is going to make an attack on us or not. I have heard that some members of the present Administration have been greatly disturbed for fear that we would have war with Japan. I do not believe it is possible for Japan ever to commence a war against us, and I know we will not commence a war against Japan; at least I think not.

But, Mr. President, if you double the Army you will double the expense and you will probably have some incentive on the part of a large number of people to get up a difficulty, if possible, with some nation so that they may be useful and that the avenues of preferment and distinction may be opened to them.

We have a tremendous Army and Navy expense and it requires continued effort on the part of members of this body to keep down the expenses in that line. Last year our total Army expense was $117,946,692, practically $118,000,000. It will be considerably more than that this year with all these various items, I presume. The expense of our Navy last year was $110,474,000. I understand that it will be considerably larger than that this year. But I do not think that the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Naval Affairs, unless they bring in a great number of new projects, ought to be criticised particularly. I believe that the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate have been fairly modest, considering the demand that has been made on them. I understand they are going to report only two battle ships, while the demand on them is for four.

Mr. President, I am not one of those who believe we need a great army, or especially a great navy, but of the two I should prefer a great navy to a great army, because I think sometimes we might make the Navy useful, and I do not know of any way by which you can make the American Army particularly useful. I am one of those who believe that peace and order ought to be maintained in this country, not with the American soldiers, but with the civil authorities. I believe that that can be done in every part of this country. I remember but once or twice in my lifetime since the war that I have seen a condition existing anywhere in the country where, in my opinion, the use of the American Army was justified.

Away back, soon after I came into this body, a provision came from the House in one of the appropriation bills, as I recollect it, that the American Army should only be used where there was a positive provision of law for its use. That was passed through the Senate by a bare majority, as it came from the House, with four Republican votes. I was siting then on the Republican side, and four of us voted with the Democrats on that proposition, and it became a law.

Mr. President, I believe that that ought to be the law. I believe that the States ought to take care of the strikes and difficulties that occur in the different sections of the country; and this demand, whether it be in Kentucky or somewhere else, for an American Army is a mistake.

Mr. McCREARY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. McCREARY. I wish to know if there has been a demand made in Kentucky for the Army.

Mr. TELLER. I will say for the credit of Kentucky, I believe they have not made that demand, but if that trouble had existed in some other sections of the country I have no doubt the General Government would have been called upon to intervene.

I was struck by the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Finance this morning, that we were approaching a very large and serious deficit in our financial affairs, which I suppose everybody knew except, perhaps, as to the exact details which he gave. I think the admonition which he gave need not be addressed to this side of the Chamber at all. It ought to be addressed to his own side, that care should be taken in these various proposals for an expenditure of money to keep within bounds. Of course we can stand it for a year or two; we have a large amount of money on hand, $250,000,000 or so and we can overrun; but is that good administration? Is that wise? I think no one will contend that it is.

In every department of the Government every year we have had to meet this condition. We add to the appropriations. We add new bureaus to the various Departments, and new divisions. It looks to me sometimes as if the executive officers in some branches of the Government spend their time mostly in seeing how they can devise means of increasing the expenditures. I know that a good many of them expend more money than is beneficial to the country.

Mr. President, I have always been in favor of a liberal treatment of the farmers of this country, and we have built up a great Agricultural Department—no longer a bureau, but a Department of the Government. We have gone into all sorts of expenditures, immense in number and not always beneficial, but frequently absolutely hurtful. Yet the expenses have climbed up.

I was struck the other day in looking over an appropriation bill now pending in another place, if it has not got through yet—the agricultural appropriation bill. It does not go to the Committee on Appropriations of which I am a member, and I do not expect to have any criticism to make on it except when it comes here. In 1896 there was established in that Department a Bureau of Soils. Just exactly what the Bureau of Soils was to do I think no one at that time knew. We have out in the Western country all sorts of soils, and I suppose a few pounds were sent down to the Department here to determine whether they were really soils that would raise crops or whether they were not.

At all events, the next appropriation was made, and that appropriation was $15,000. That would look like it was a rather large sum of money for the purpose of determining the ingredients of the soil in the different sections of the country. In 1898 we added $15,000 again. In the next year the Department said they needed more money, and as this was a very valuable thing to the farmers, they declared that they must have it, and Congress gave them $26,000. The next appropriation made was $109,000. From $26,000 it went up to $109,000. Does anyone believe that that Bureau has grown to the extent that it needed an increase from $26,000 in 1900 to $109,000 in 1902? The next appropriation was $169,000. The next appropriation was $214,000. The last appropriation was $204,000. By some accident $10,000 was dropped out.

I will venture to say that there is not a Senator here who knows really what the Bureau of Soils does. I know there is not one who can show that the Bureau of Soils has benefited the country to the extent since it has been organized of nearly three-quarters of a million of dollars.

That is one of a dozen things that come before us. We started a few years ago with a little provision in the statute that under certain circumstances the President of the United States might withdraw from sale certain lands and make forest reserves. We had expected that that would occur on the top of the mountains, where the timber was not commercial and where no person would make a home, and where there was nothing except rocks and a few trees and a great deal of snow at certain seasons of the year. I think the appropriation was from three to five thousand dollars the first year. This year it will be over $3,000,000, besides what they have taken in, and I do not know how much that is. When the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] gets the statement printed we may be able to find out. Up to this time I have never been able to find out.

The Government of the United States has established a system of forest reserves. The people in some sections of the country have gone wild about the forest reserves. They tell us that we have burnt up the timber and that we have wasted it and the only salvation now is the protecting hand of the National Government. The States of New York, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, if they are not here officially, their people are here, some of them at least, and people from other sections, begging us to establish down in the South a great big national reserve, with millions and millions of acres of land now in private ownership to be bought by the Government of the United States and to be put into a timber reserve.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will it interrupt the Senator if I ask him to recur to the section of the act of last year which provided for the Bureau of Soils. I want to get the appropriation that was made last year.

Mr. TELLER. In 1906 it was $204,000. That is the way it was reported, I believe, in the House.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I want to say to the Senator the present bill as it passed the House and is now before the committee of this body appropriates $368,000.

Mr. TELLER. The bill has not gotten over here and I did not know how much it was. That is a rather rapid increase, from $204,000 to $368,000. But, Mr. President, this is not quite as large as the appropriation for the preservation of the American forests. I am one of those who believe——

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. I can give the Senator from Colorado the figures on the appropriation as it passed the House for the Forestry Service. It is $3,796,200.

Mr. TELLER. That is a little larger than I supposed it was, but I am not at all surprised, because I know that practically we have surrendered the control of the forests and other lands to the forest-reserve authorities. The American who wants to make a home on the public lands has nothing to say about it, Mr. President.

I do not complain. Some people have taken an interest in forest reserves, but is it worth all the money that it costs? We are told every few days that in twenty-eight years the forests will be exhausted in the United States, and then we shall look to some foreign country for our relief. Yet if anybody should suggest that there was a great big country lying north of us anxious to sell us the finest timber in the world that we by our tariff keep out, I suppose the forest-reserve people who have now gone into the lumber business would be greatly outraged if we should conclude to remove the duty on timber coming from Canada and British Columbia. It seems to me it would be wisdom, if we are likely to run out of timber in a few years, to husband our resources and buy some for a time where it can be had and where the people are not so choice with their lumber as we are here.

Mr. President, there is another thing that we have gone into.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. TELLER. In a moment. We have of course a great army of these caretakers in the forests. Not only are they taking care of the forests, but we are told that they are planting trees, and the Government is in the nursery business as well as in the lumber business. I do not know how many there are. I undertook to find out last year how many employees the Forest Reserve Service had, and if we find out at all it will be when the report is printed that the Senator from Idaho had up a few minutes since.

We have to-day, I will venture to say, more special agents than any other country in the world. We have made vast appropriations every year for the special caretakers of the public land and special agents to go out and see that the people do not rob the Government. How many there are I do not believe anybody knows, but that is one of the expenses that you have every year and that you increase every year, like the appropriations for the Bureau of Soils. It will be $100,000 one year and $200,000 the next.

If you are going to economize, you have got to get down to these small items. One hundred thousand dollars; oh, that is nothing—put it in the bill. Ten hundred thousand dollars is a million, and a million is a million taken out of the people who work and who create the wealth of this country. It does not come out of the rich; it comes out of the industry of the country, and it is a tax upon it.

I received a letter some time ago from the Director of the Forest Reserves, in which he congratulated me that Colorado would receive $12,000, generously allowed to us by the General Government out of the revenues of the Forest Reserve Service. When Congress, against my vote and protest, put that provision in the statute, they put also a provision in which I deny their right to do, and provided that 10 per cent of whatever was taken in should be paid to the State. Then they provided, with an arrogance that I have never seen before in any of my public service, that the State should use that money for school purposes and for roads.

Mr. President, if it went at all into the treasury of the State, it belonged to the State and the State has a right to use it. That was a sop supposed to be given to our people, so that they would be satisfied with taking areas of country as big as some of the States and dooming them to solitude and silence, as the saying is, keeping human habitations away from them and making it impossible for any man connected with the State to derive any benefit from it whatever, and to put a troop of Government officers into the reserves for the purpose of securing to the Government a revenue from that which heretofore had been common to all the people of this country.

I do not know, Mr. President, of that vast sum, $12,000, which Colorado received last year, how much came from the grazing of cattle on the public lands. I do not know how much of it came from the honest miner who had paid the Government for the right to cut timber and put it in his mine. I do not know how much of it came from the man who built a cabin on the edge of the timber on a prairie farm and took timber to make his cabin. A very well-known settler said to me, "I drove on the forest reserve my horses and wagon, and I picked up a load of pine knots, and when I drove off there was a forest ranger there who said: 'You must pay for these pine knots.' And I finally gave him a quarter of a dollar to avoid arrest."

Mr. President, I have made some complaint about this matter before. I want to make it again. I mean to continue to make it. I do not want to have anybody here make speeches in favor of economy unless he begins at the proper place, and that is in these small items. The question is whether you are going to buy all the Appalachian Range and pay $5 or $10 an acre for it and put it in a forest reserve. Are States supposed to be willing to cede their jurisdiction? Old Story, who was at one time supposed to be a lawyer and a good judge, declared that the General Government had no right to buy land unless it was to exercise on it a public function. No man can show me authority for it. I deny the right of the Government to buy land and make a forest reserve out of it.

Possibly the Government has authority to reserve land from sale under the law and thus establish forest reserves within the constitutional provisions; but, Mr. President, it is a violation of the principles upon which all the States were admitted into the Union when we provided that while the Government held the lands we would not tax them, because we supposed the Government was doing what the Supreme Court of the United States declared again and again it was doing, holding the lands in trust for the public to use and not for its own gain, except what it might get out of the sale of them.

Mr. President, I do not care to continue this line, except I want to say when the appropriation bill to which I referred comes here I shall endeavor to cut down some of the extraordinary appropriations that are under the paternal idea that we can not do anything for ourselves and the Government has got to do it all. I am one of those who believe a man who does not help himself does not deserve being helped. If the State can not take care of its own forests and take care of everything that belongs to it, it ought not to be a State. I am disgusted and irritated when a man comes in and says, "You ought to do this; we can not do it; the State can not do it as well as the General Government." Why not abolish State lines if that is the fact?

Mr. President, there is not a man here who would dare to think of abolishing State lines. Everybody would know practically that it would be a dissolution of this Government when we had abolished State lines.

But you are willing, some of you, at least, to shear the States, or if you are not here, in some of the other branches of the Government they are anxious to shear the States of all the power and gather in the hands of the Executive of the nation the powers that belong to the people of the States by the very words and letters of the Constitution and by every principle that underlies a free government.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment. On page 4, in line 9, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, in line 9, insert as a separate paragraph the following:

For the repair and construction of needful buildings and the construction and installation of suitable modern armament, with a view to strengthening and modernizing Fort Macon, N. C., $250,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Just one word in explanation.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. PERKINS. I ask the Senator from North Carolina if there is any estimate from the War Department for that appropriation?

Mr. SIMMONS. There has been none. I introduced a bill covering this amendment, but there has been no report upon it and no estimate. I trust that the Senator from California will not make a point of order against the amendment, because I think I can satisfy him in a few minutes that the work which the amendment provides for is very much needed in the public interest.

Fort Macon is an old fort, built many years before the war at a cost of something over $400,000, and is located at the entrance of Beaufort Harbor. One of the first naval battles of the war was an attack upon this fort. The Government still keeps a few men there, but the fort itself is out of repair, and, I might say, in a state of decay. Its armament is old and obsolete. In its present condition in times of war it would be of no service for the purpose of defense.

Beaufort is an important harbor on the North Carolina coast; in fact it is the only harbor on that coast, except by way of the Cape Fear River, which a vessel of any considerable draft can enter. Ocracoke and Hatteras have in recent years been practically closed to all except very light-drafted vessels.

I do not know why the Government has practically abandoned Fort Macon since the war, but I suppose it is due largely to the fact that Beaufort Harbor was not considered of any great commercial or strategic importance. But recently this has been changed. Beaufort Harbor has become the terminus of a very important railway system, and in a short time it will be connected by a canal of 10 feet depth, which the Government is now preparing to construct and for which an appropriation of $550,000 was made by the last Congress, with the system of sounds extending along the North Carolina coast from Beaufort Harbor to near the Virginia line. These sounds and the rivers which empty into them represent about 2,500 miles of navigable water. When this canal is finished, in times of war, unless Beaufort Harbor is fortified, not only Beaufort Harbor, but all the territory which can be reached by this 2,500 miles of navigable water would be at the mercy of the enemy. Light-drafted vessels of war could penetrate through these sounds and the five or six bold rivers flowing into them 150 miles in different directions into the very interior of the State.

I submit that this situation makes it important that this old fort should be repaired, modernized, and put in readiness against the day of possible danger to the large interests which would be jeopardized in case of war by the failure of the Government to protect this approach.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, my friend from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] is aware that the Board of Ordnance and Fortification was organized in March, 1885. It consisted of nine members, I think—the General of the Army, the Chief Engineer, the Chief of Artillery, the Chief of Ordnance and Fortification, two members of the Navy, and a distinguished civilian. They planned, I think, to fortify twenty-eight different ports of the United States at that time. Every year they have made their estimates to Congress and we have appropriated from time to time until to-day we have $72,000,000 that has already been expended upon these fortifications that was authorized by the Board of Ordnance and Fortification and which was ratified under an act of Congress.

It has been the policy of these boards not to designate in the bill any particular place, but they have distributed their fortifications after consultation where they believed it would be for the best interests of the country. So it is a departure for your committee to recommend any particular fortification, except in some instances like Galveston, Mobile, and Pensacola, which were visited by hurricanes and tornadoes which swept everything away.

I will state further that in 1906, I think, the President organized this board, and the Secretary of War sent a communication to Congress with the report of this Board of Ordnance and Fortification. It consists of Maj. Gen. J. Franklin Bell, Chief of Staff, president; Brig. Gen. William Crozier, Chief of Ordnance; Brig. Gen. A. Mackenzie, Chief of Engineers; Brig. Gen. Arthur Murray, Chief of Artillery; Lieut. Col. George F. E. Harrison, Coast Artillery Corps; Lieut. Col. Erasmus M. Weaver, Coast Artillery Corps; and Gen. Thomas J. Henderson, civilian member. Maj. Lawson M. Fuller, Ordnance Department, continues as recorder.

They made their estimates to Congress amounting, as I have said before, to $38,000,000 in round numbers. Your committee, in considering the recommendations, reduced the estimate which they gave to Congress from $38,000,000 to $11,000,000 in round numbers. Yet in those liberal appropriations I find no recommendation for the improving or rehabilitating of Fort Macon, unless it is contained in this section:

For the protection, preservation, and repair of fortifications for which there may be no special appropriation available, $225,000.

The testimony before your committee was that that covers all the estimates of the Department for repairs that were necessary to maintain the different fortifications that were under the direction of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification; and in these liberal estimates there has been none made for Fort Macon. I do not feel like making a point of order against my friend's amendment, however.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Do I understand the Senator to say that the appropriation that he has just referred to is of something over $200,000 for fortifications——

Mr. PERKINS. Two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars for repairs of fortifications.

Mr. SIMMONS. Would be available for the repairs?

Mr. PERKINS. It will be available for this purpose, if my friend from North Carolina can convince the Board of Ordnance and Fortification that it is necessary to use part of this sum on Fort Macon for its repair.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. This is an amendment not comprehended by the report of the committee.

Mr. PERKINS. And not estimated for.

Mr. WARREN. And not estimated for.

Mr. PERKINS. Nor submitted to our committee.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to my colleague on the committee that I feel compelled, I think, to make the point of order, because we have here an estimate of nearly $40,000,000. There are other things that might be done and ought to be done and probably will be done to greatly increase that amount.

Now, aside from a few special appropriations, as indicated by the Senator, all of these appropriations are in lump and left to the discretion of the Secretary.

The statement of the Senator from North Carolina appeals to me very strongly, as many another statement regarding other localities do. It seems to me we must ask the Senator to be more patient, to take for those places so much as the Department may see fit to allot, until we can move along year by year and build it up in time.

I shall be compelled, Mr. President, to make the point of order against the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the Senator to withhold his point of order for one minute.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly; I withhold it for any remarks the Senator may wish to make.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course I am aware at the present time that this amendment is open to the point of order, but I trust——

Mr. PERKINS. If the Senator will permit me, it will be in order for the Senator to move to increase the amount, if he has any data which justifies it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no data except some information that quite a considerable sum would be necessary in order to repair and rehabilitate this particular fort.

If I understood the Senator from California aright a few moments ago, he said that the board of which he spoke authorized the taking into consideration of these various projects. This is not a new project. It is not a project which has been submitted to a board and passed upon, but it is exactly analogous to the case of the port of Mobile, which immediately precedes in the bill the place where I propose to insert my amendment.

I call the attention of the Senator from California to the fact that this bill contains two provisions for appropriations exactly of the character of the one which my amendment proposes.

On page 4, there is an appropriation made of $589,000—

To complete the repair and restoration of batteries and other structures appurtenant to the defenses of Mobile, Ala., etc.

Now, what I propose here is exactly that thing. We have the fort. It is probably between fifty and seventy-five years old, and is now in a way kept by the Government. The Government has its officers there. All I desire is a reasonable appropriation to repair, arm, and modernize it, so that in case of war it would serve the purpose for which it was constructed. In its present condition it would be utterly useless for purposes of defense.

I hope the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] will not insist upon the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. CLAY. The question is on the point of order, as I understand it, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] state what is the ground of his point of order?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the point of order is made on the ground that the item is not estimated for and has not been reported favorably from any committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the point is well taken, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I was unavoidably absent from the Chamber when the bill was taken up and during a large part of its consideration. I am therefore unable to determine, without making inquiry, as to whether there is any provision in the bill made in accordance with an estimate from the Chief of Ordnance to the Secretary of War relative to the small appropriation necessary in order that a previous appropriation made for the Augusta Arsenal can be made effective. I do not know whether it is in the bill or not. If not, I want to ask the Senator in charge of the bill to give me the opportunity to present it. Is there anything, I would ask the Senator from California, with his permission, relative to the Augusta Arsenal in this bill?

Mr. PERKINS. Not any more so than there is for any other arsenal. I think that arsenal is included in the appropriation on page 3, commencing in line 18, which reads:

For the protection, preservation, and repair of fortifications for which there may be no special appropriation available, $225,000.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I have in my office, and will send for it immediately, a copy of an estimate and recommendation of the Chief of Ordnance, asking for an appropriation of $6,000 in order that the previous appropriation of $50,000 may be made practically available. The appropriation heretofore made was for the purchase of machinery and the renovation of the Augusta Arsenal in some particulars, so as to put it in a shape where it would be of practical use to the Government, where certain work is needed. That money has been properly expended, but there is nothing in the appropriation which would allow the use of any part of it for the installation of machinery and for certain changes which are necessary in the building in order that such machinery may be installed.

I would not make the suggestion to the Senator if it were not that this is strictly in accordance with the rules of the Senate in the reception and consideration of amendments. There is—and I have a copy of it in my office, as I have said—a distinct recommendation for this specific appropriation of $6,000 for this identical purpose.

Mr. PERKINS. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that on the recommendation of the Chief of Ordnance and the Chief of the Signal Corps, under whose direction the supervision of this work is done, your committee increased the appropriation on page 3, "for supplying current for power and lighting at seacoast fortifications," from $100,000 to $348,888. That money will be available for this purpose if the Chief of the Bureau, with the approval of the Secretary of War, sees proper to so apply it. Therefore I think it is unnecessary to further amend the item.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, might not the other estimates exhaust the amount of the appropriation?

Mr. PERKINS. They might have done so, Mr. President, had not your committee nearly trebled the appropriation for this purpose as the bill came from the other House. We have anticipated the wants of the arsenal to which the Senator from Georgia refers by increasing this appropriation, as I have stated, from $100,000 to $384,888.

Mr. BACON. I understand from the Senator, then, that I may rest in perfect confidence in the fact that the $6,000 recommended in the estimate of the Chief of Ordnance can be paid out of this fund?

Mr. PERKINS. Your committee understood the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, General Crozier, when he appeared before the committee, that he could use this appropriation for purposes which embrace the one which has been enumerated by the Senator from Georgia. At all events, he appeared before us and made a specific recommendation for this purpose.

Your committee must necessarily, Mr. President, rely upon the recommendations of chiefs of bureaus of the respective Departments of the Government for the information necessary to enable them intelligently to make such appropriations, and none is superior certainly in point of ability to our present Chief of Ordnance. We gave him all he asked for, all that it was absolutely necessary for him to have in order to carry out the improvements along the lines on which my friend from Georgia has been making his argument.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, if I recollect aright—I have sent for the paper and I hope it will be here in a moment—this was a supplemental estimate, and it comes within the class designated by the Senator from California, of an appropriation recommended by that officer. It is for a specific purpose.

I desire to say, Mr. President, in that connection, that it is not only important from an ordinary standpoint that the $6,000 should be appropriated, but that until that amount is available to the Chief of Ordnance the $50,000 heretofore appropriated two or three years ago for the purpose of getting the necessary machinery, etc., is absolutely of no effect and can not be made of any practical benefit.

I have here now, which has just been brought to me, the estimate. I have a copy which was sent to me by General Crozier which I shall read. It is not necessary that I should read the heading, which is the usual blank with the printed provisions of law which relate to matters of this kind, and it is, as I recollected, denominated "Supplemental Estimates of Appropriations Required for the Service of the Fiscal Year ending June 30, 1909, by the Ordnance Department, United States Army."

On the left of the column there is the heading:

General object.
Title of appropriation.

And under that the words "Augusta Arsenal, Augusta, Ga." Then the next heading is "Detailed objects of expenditures, and explanations."

For the installation of machinery and for changes in buildings to receive it. Note.—

Now comes the explanation, and I trust the Senator from California will mark the importance of it—

NOTE.—The amount asked for is necessary for the installation of the new machinery provided for by the appropriation of $50,000 in the sundry civil bill approved March 3, 1905, and for changes in the existing buildings to receive the plant, the terms of the appropriation making it available for machinery only. If the additional appropriation is not made, it will be necessary to change that of March 3, 1905, so as to make $6,000 of it available for the purpose herein mentioned. Although this necessity developed some time ago, it was not before the regular estimates were submitted.

WILLIAM CROZIER,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Ordnance, United States Army.

ORDNANCE OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 31, 1908.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Wyoming will pardon me for just a moment. The Senator from California will note the fact that this item is said in this estimate to be a necessary appropriation—the word "necessary" is used—and the explanation is given why it was not included in the original estimate, and that explanation is this:

Although this necessity developed some time ago, it was not before the regular estimates were submitted.

Then there is stated opposite to it—

Estimated amount which will be required for each detailed object of expenditure, $6,000.

I will now yield with pleasure to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator should present that amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill. Arsenals are provided for on the sundry civil appropriation bill, and such appropriations in the main are made there.

Mr. BACON. I want to say to the Senator from Wyoming that if I am in error in offering this amendment at this time, I am in error because of the information which I received from the Senator from Wyoming. I went to him when the Army appropriation bill was up and asked him what particular bill this provision should go upon, and I understood him to say it should go on the fortifications bill.

Mr. WARREN. I thought so myself this morning, but on looking over the matter to verify my statement I find that while once there was a provision in regard to arsenals carried in the Army bill, and while possibly there may have been something relating to arsenals in the fortifications bill, yet arsenals proper have been taken care of on the sundry civil bill. I will say that the chairman of the subcommittee on the fortifications bill is a member of the subcommittee on the sundry civil bill. I think I am right in saying that what I heretofore told the Senator was a mistake, and that his amendment really belongs upon the sundry civil bill.

Mr. BACON. Of course, I must yield to the superior knowledge of the Senator from Wyoming, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, but inasmuch as we have the matter up, and I do not think it is inappropriate on this bill, and as the matter has now been explained to the Senate and the absolute propriety of it made manifest, I would be very glad if it could be put upon this bill, and let us get through with it, so that I will not have to repeat what I have already said.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BACON. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. PERKINS. I was about to remark, Mr. President, that I think the Committee on Appropriations, in connection with the sundry civil appropriation bill, probably have jurisdiction over this matter; but if the Senator from Georgia desires to press it, we will accept it and let it go into conference, where we can consider it.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will do so, and I appreciate very much his courtesy in the matter. It is an appropriation which is manifestly proper. The question of its being upon this or the other bill is not of vital importance, I presume. I therefore, Mr. President, would be glad to have the amendment agreed to. I have not reduced it to writing; but if the Senator from California will indicate at what point in the bill he would prefer to have the amendment come in, I should be glad.

Mr. WARREN. In the meantime I think the Senator will notice that by the statement he has read the original appropriation was carried on the sundry civil bill.

Mr. BACON. It was; that is true.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from California will indicate to me the point at which it comes in I will simply use the language of the estimate, namely:

For the installation of machinery and for changes in buildings to receive it at the Augusta Arsenal, at Augusta, Ga., $6,000.

Mr. PERKINS. I think the amendment should come in on page 4, after the word "dollars," in line 4, and that it should be a new paragraph.

Mr. BACON. I thank the Senator very much.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, after line 4, it is proposed to insert as a new paragraph the following:

For the installation of machinery and for changes in buildings to receive it at the Augusta Arsenal, at Augusta, Ga., $6,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of this bill a question with reference to the Senate amendment on page 4, lines 19, 20, and 21, for the construction of a sea wall at Galveston. As I recall, there were three sections of that sea wall contemplated originally, or rather the wall was divided into three sections. As I remember, the Government built one; the city built one, and I remember several years ago there was some contention between the two as to who should build the other section. Is this amendment to put in something that was washed out, or is it to put in the third section, or what is the object of it?

Mr. PERKINS. It is estimated for in the Book of Estimates by the Secretary of War and recommended by the Department. It is simply a question of policy and expediency. The committee, on considering the matter, had in view the fact that Galveston had been visited by a great tornado; that millions of dollars' worth of property and hundreds of lives had been lost, and yet the people of Galveston had shown indomitable will, energy, and force, and had rebuilt the city at their own expense, taxing themselves enormously for that purpose. We therefore believed that the Government should act upon this matter in a liberal manner, and so we unanimously recommended this appropriation.

Mr. BURKETT. I do not think the Senator understands my question. I am not questioning the advisability of it. I am inquiring what portion of this wall this appropriation is for.

Mr. PERKINS. It is to protect some of the Government fortifications there; but I have not the geography of the harbor photographed on my memory at this time, and so I am unable to give the exact location.

Mr. BURKETT. I remember, Mr. President—and I was interested in this matter because I was on the committee that had charge of it when the original section of the wall was built by Congress—that after the flood at Galveston the engineers determined upon a sea wall. The city built the first section of it. It was a tremendous undertaking and constructed at an enormous expense, and the city of Galveston showed a good deal of pluck and a good deal of loyalty to their particular community in undertaking to build up the town. The Government built at that time a sea wall in front of the Government property. There was, as I recall, a section of about a mile to be built of the other sections, not quite so much perhaps as the city of Galveston had built between the ends of these two walls. There was some controversy at that time, I remember, as to whether the wall should be extended north along the east side of the Government property to protect it, or whether they should hitch the east end of the Government wall and the west end of the city wall together. I remember the ground of the controversy at that time was that, it not being on Government property or in front of Government property, the Government would be without authority to build a wall to connect the two sections together, which seemed the best thing to do from an engineering standpoint. I was wondering whether this provision was to build around the corner or whether it was to connect those two sections.

Mr. KEAN. It says "to build on the Government reservation."

Mr. BURKETT. If the Senator from Texas were here, he would be able to explain it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, on page 3, line 20, I move to strike out the word "two," before the word "hundred," and insert the word "three" in place thereof.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 20, before the word "hundred," it is proposed to strike out "two" and insert "three," so as to read:

For the protection, preservation, and repair of fortifications for which there may be no special appropriation available, $325,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] to say a little while ago that this was intended to provide for just such cases as that embraced in my amendment. I do not think the amount appropriated by this bill as it now stands will be sufficient, and I simply desire to increase it.

Mr. PERKINS. The question is simply one of policy for the Senate to determine; and, therefore, if the Senate shall determine, as a question of expediency, to increase the amount $100,000, your committee will abide by the will of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ADDITION TO DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT-HOUSE.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4172) providing for the erection of an addition to the court-house in the District of Columbia for the use of the court of appeals.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $200,000 for the construction of an addition to the court-house of the District of Columbia for the use of the court of appeals of the District.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BURKETT. I am directed by the Committee on Pacific Railroads to report favorably with amendments Senate resolution No. 93, and I submit a report (No. 481) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] to the matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska, from the Committee on Pacific Railroads, reports a resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution which had been submitted by Mr. HEYBURN on February 6, 1908, as follows:

Whereas the Northern Pacific Railway Company, a Wisconsin corporation, claims ownership of all the property and estate formerly of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation created by Congress, and in certain litigation instituted by the United States Government in the United States circuit court for the district of Minnesota for the enforcement of the act of Congress of August 7, 1888 (Rev. Stat., sec. 5269), relative to the exercise of telegraphic franchises, the said Wisconsin corporation, opposing the enforcement of said statute and of the duties and obligations imposed by Congress as to the Northern Pacific Railroad and telegraph line, asserted and averred that by reason of certain foreclosure proceedings and of the purchase of the Northern Pacific estate thereunder on and subsequent to July 25, 1896, the said Wisconsin corporation and the said property are relieved from any of the obligations created by the various acts of Congress which were set forth in the bill of complaint of the United States; and

Whereas said Wisconsin corporation has certified to the Interstate Commerce Commission that its capital stock of $155,000,000 was issued "for the purchase of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company's property," and from the statement of said Wisconsin corporation filed with the State of Montana (a certified copy of which is annexed to this resolution) it appears that all of said stock was issued on and prior to July 13, 1896, before any of said judicial sales occurred, and that, with the exception of forty-three shares thereof, all of said stock was issued in payment for the "stocks, bonds, and securities formerly of or belonging to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, or of interests therein," which stocks, bonds, and securities, it was recited in said statement, "had a cash value exceeding $40,000,000;" and

Whereas it is a matter of public concern that it should be ascertained whether the ownership by the said Wisconsin corporation of the Northern Pacific Railroad land grant and telegraph line is acquired by virtue of valid foreclosure sales divesting the title of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company or whether the same is acquired by purchase of certain securities of the latter company, to the end that it may be determined whether the legal title to the property itself—the railroad, telegraph line, and lands—is vested in a State corporation or in a corporation of Congressional creation over which Congress is possessed of direct and immediate legislative and visitorial power; and

Whereas to enable a vast and unwarranted increase to be made in the issuance and marketing of new stocks and bonds it is alleged that the said Wisconsin corporation upon acquiring the possession of the Northern Pacific estate at once placed upon the same a valuation many millions of dollars in excess of the actual cost thereof, as well as many millions in excess of the valuation which had been reported and returned for the same property immediately prior thereto whilst in the possession or ownership of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate such information as may be obtainable from the Department of Justice, the Department of the Interior, and the Interstate Commerce Commission, upon the matters herein referred to, and to inform the Senate whether on behalf of the Government, through the Department of Justice or otherwise, any investigation has ever been made as to the method of the so-called "reorganization" of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, under which the Wisconsin corporation, known as the "Northern Pacific Railway Company," claims to have acquired the title to the Northern Pacific estate; and if so, with what result.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the proposed amendments have not been stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendments reported by the committee.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the resolution has been read to-day, and it had better go to the Calendar.

Mr. HEYBURN. Before that is done, I desire to say that the committee, recommending the striking out of the preamble and the recitals, have merely reported the resolution in favor of calling upon the President to furnish to the Senate information. It seems to me there could be no objection to having the information; and when the information is in, then I imagine there will be some discussion; but I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution asking for information. The recitals have all been stricken out.

Mr. NELSON. I shall have to ask that the resolution go over. I want to examine it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go to the Calendar, at the request of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HEYBURN. The amendments reported by the committee were not read. The resolution as reported by the committee is not the resolution as introduced. Is it not customary under the rule that the resolution as reported be read?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is usual to read a resolution as it was originally introduced. The amendments are considered when the resolution is taken up for action.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to have the resolution printed, so that it will show how it was in its original form and how it has been amended by the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. BURKETT. The preamble, Mr. President, as the report shows, is stricken out.

Mr. HEYBURN. Did the Senator state that the report on the resolution was favorable, with amendments?

Mr. BURKETT. I stated that the resolution was reported favorably with amendments.

PENSIONERS OF THE METROPOLITAN POLICE FUND.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6105) for the relief of pensioners of the Metropolitan police fund.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments, in line 3, after the word "of," to strike out "fifteen thousand six hundred and forty-nine dollars and eighty-eight" and to insert "sixteen thousand seven hundred and eleven dollars and sixty four;" in line 9, after the word "June," to strike out "thirtieth" and insert "first;" and on page 2, line 1, after the word "fund," to insert "in case of the death of any beneficiary under the provisions of this act, the amount due such beneficiary shall be paid to the legal representative thereof," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $16,711.64 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, to pay the amount withheld from pensioners of the police fund on account of deficiencies in said fund during the period from June 1, 1894, to May 31, 1896; and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to adjust and settle all claims for said deficiencies in the payment of allowances made by them to pensioners of said police fund. In case of the death of any beneficiary under the provisions of this act, the amount due such beneficiary shall be paid to the legal representative thereof.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator in charge of the bill explain just a little about it. I do not understand it.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, there is nothing at all wrong about the bill. It relates to the Metropolitan police fund of the District of Columbia. The bill gives the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the right to pay this fund out to the people to whom it is due. It has been due for some time, but payment has been held up. The Commissioners have furnished a list of the amount coming to each one of the beneficiaries under this bill, and the amounts vary, I think, from $19, probably, up to $150. It is absolutely a just bill, and these people are entitled to the money.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE ABRAHAM L. BRICK.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. ABRAHAM L. BRICK, late a Representative from the State of Indiana, and transmitted resolutions of the House thereon.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I ask that the resolutions of the House be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions of the House, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
April 7, 1908.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. ABRAHAM L. BRICK, a Representative from the State of Indiana.

Resolved, That a committee of sixteen Members of the House be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions; and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect, this House do now recess until Wednesday, April 8, at 11:30 a. m.

The Speaker announced the appointment of Mr. OVERSTREET, Mr. WATSON, Mr. CRUMPACKER, Mr. HOLLIDAY, Mr. CHANEY, Mr. FOSTER of Indiana, Mr. GILHAMS, Mr. DIXON, Mr. COX of Indiana, Mr. GILLETT, Mr. GRAFF, Mr. BOWERS, Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan, Mr. COLE, Mr. LLOYD, and Mr. ALEXANDER of New York.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague [Mr. HEMENWAY] as well as myself, I submit resolutions and ask for their present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of Hon. ABRAHAM L. BRICK, late a Representative from the State of Indiana.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Indiana.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to, and (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Thursday, April 9, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 7, 1908.

[Continuation of legislative day of Monday, April 6, 1908.]

The recess having expired, at 11 o'clock and 30 minutes a. m. the House was called to order by the Speaker.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6303. An act authorizing the allotment of lands to certain Sioux Indians of the Rosebud Reservation, in the State of South Dakota;

S. 6234. An act for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in Texas;

S. 2253. An act for the relief of Theodore F. Northrop;

S. 6189. An act granting a right of way to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company across the Fort Mason Military Reservation in California;

S. 6309. An act to provide for the completion of the park surrounding the filtration plant in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

S. 6083. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at the city of Miami, in the State of Florida;

S. 753. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Wallingford, in the State of Connecticut;

S. 592. An act providing for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at the city of Walla Walla, in the State of Washington;

S. 6113. An act providing for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Muskogee, Okla.;

S. 3159. An act to authorize the extension, enlargement, and alteration of the public building in the city of Kansas City, Kans.;

S. 474. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Abbeville, in the State of South Carolina;

S. 549. An act granting medals to certain Indian policemen of the Standing Rock Agency, N. Dak.;

S. R. 55. Joint resolution authorizing the use of a dredge in improving the channel of Coos Bay, Oregon;

S. 384. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Minot, N. Dak.;

S. 48. An act to reimburse depositors of the late Freedman's Savings and Trust Company;

S. 6363. An act granting title to a parcel of land in the city of Dubuque, Iowa, heretofore known as St. Raphael's Cemetery, to the archbishop of Dubuque and his successors in office, and confirming and establishing title thereto accordingly; and

S. 6462. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents in fee to the Diocese of Duluth of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America for certain lands in Minnesota set apart for the use of said church for missionary purposes among the Chippewa Indians.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 7618) to authorize the Benton Water Company, its successors or assigns, to construct a dam across the Snake River, in the State of Washington, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. NELSON, Mr. PILES, and Mr. MARTIN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 18754. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the statue of Jabez Lamar Monroe Curry, presented by the State of Alabama to be placed in Statuary Hall, is accepted in the name of the United States, and that the thanks of Congress be tendered the State for the contribution of the statue of one of its most eminent citizens, illustrious for his distinguished civic services.

Second. That a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed and duly authenticated, be transmitted to the governor of Alabama.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bills and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 1589. An act granting an increase of pension to Susan M. Yeoman;

H. R. 17874. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers of said war; and

H. J. Res. 148. Joint resolution donating to the Commonwealth of Oklahoma the new flag now floating over the National Capitol.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 20063) making provision for the District of Columbia for the ensuing year.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 100, noes 75.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point, Mr. Speaker, that that is dilatory.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of no quorum. The Sergeant-at-Arms will close the doors and notify absent Members, the yeas and nays are ordered under the rule——

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I will withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York also makes it.

Mr. PAYNE. No, Mr. Speaker; I made the point of order that the call for tellers was dilatory.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman from New York did not make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. It is as broad as it is long.

Mr. TAWNEY. I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will make the point of order, and take notice that there is no quorum present. [Laughter.] The doors will be closed, the Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absent Members, the yeas and nays are ordered under the rule, and as many as are in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Michigan when his name is called will answer "aye," and those opposed will answer "no;" those present will answer "present." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 205, nays 56, answered "present" 12, not voting 114, as follows:

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20063, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, with Mr. DALZELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For care, including salaries of all necessary employees, maintenance, and operation of the Washington Aqueduct, District of Columbia, filtration plant, and for each and every purpose connected therewith, $82,000: Provided, That of the appropriation for these purposes for the fiscal year 1908 not exceeding $6,000 may be used for parking the grounds at the Washington City reservoir.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 40, after the word "reservoir," in line 3, insert the words: "To be available until the close of the fiscal year 1909."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, what does the gentleman mean by that—to make it immediately available?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. No; available during the coming year. They can not do this work at this time. They have the money, and simply want to use it when they can do the work.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is a prior appropriation.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. A prior appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Attendance officers: For two attendance officers, authorized by the act providing for compulsory education in the District of Columbia, approved June 8, 1906, at $600 each; one attendance officer, $900; in all, $2,100.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after line 6, page 41, the following: "That from and after the passage of this act the labor of children"——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, on that I make a point of order.

Mr. PETERS. I would ask the gentleman to reserve his point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, I think we ought to make the point of order and get through with it. I make a point of order—well, I will reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report further, until the Chair can determine what the amendment is.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. This, as I understand it, is offered as an amendment, and the first part of it seems to be an entirely separate and independent bill. That being the case, I do not think that it is in order to offer a bill as an amendment in the body of an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. As soon as there is sufficient of the amendment read to indicate what the purpose is, the Chair will rule on the point of order. The Clerk will continue the reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act the labor of children in the District of Columbia shall be subject to the following regulations—

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will cease reading. That is clearly out of order. It is legislation, pure and simple. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The amendment I have offered is to incorporate substantially the provisions of H. R. 16373, a bill introduced by myself and entitled, "A bill for the regulation of child labor in the District of Columbia and the Territories," as an amendment to the bill before the House. A bill including the Territories would, as an amendment, clearly be subject to a point of order, so I have drawn the amendment to include alone the District of Columbia.

This amendment provides in substance that no children under 14 years of age shall be employed in factories or workshops, and that children between the ages of 14 and 16 years shall be employed only when a certificate is filed. This certificate must show that they can read and write, have attended school, and are physically able to perform the work for which they are employed. The hours of labor in which children under 16 can work are restricted to forty-eight per week, and no children are allowed to labor between 6 p. m. and 7 a. m. Provisions are also made for proper inspection to assure the carrying out of these regulations. These provisions are, in general, those now in force in Massachusetts.

The President of the United States, in his special message to Congress on March 25, 1908, calls the subject of child labor particularly to its attention, saying:

Child labor should be prohibited throughout the nation. At least a model child-labor bill should be passed for the District of Columbia.

It is unfortunate that in the one place solely dependent upon Congress for its legislation there should be no law whatever to protect children by forbidding or regulating their labor.

The great number of children employed in the factories all over the United States indicates the necessity for their protection and the great need for immediate consideration of the problem of child-labor legislation. Of a total of 4,852,427 children, as shown in the last census, there are employed in all occupations 1,750,178 children between the ages of 10 and 15 years, of whom about one-half are 14 or 15 years old. Of the total number of children between 10 and 15 years of age who are earning money regularly by work, contributing to the family support, or appreciably assisting in mechanical or agricultural industry, there are 1,264,411 males, or 26.1 per cent of all the male children, and 485,767 females, or 10.2 per cent of all the female children in the United States.

The need of proper child-labor laws in the United States is one of the most pressing problems which confronts our people to-day. Taken up by various States in different conditions and at different times, we have child-labor laws ill-considered and, for the most part, drawn with little thought and ineffective in their results. The democracies of Massachusetts, New York, and Illinois lead the States in the regulation of child labor, but the United States as a whole utterly fails to rank in this respect with the enlightened countries of Europe. Child labor in the United States is actually increasing. England, Germany, France, Holland, and Switzerland all have labor legislation guarding the children which is far advanced over that of the United States, which, as a whole, should be ranked with Russia in this particular rather than with any of the enlightened countries referred to.

The necessity of adequate protection for the children is something which should appeal not only through principles of humanity, but through principles of expediency, to the citizens of the United States. A democracy based upon universal suffrage gains its strength from the intelligence of its people. It is essential, therefore, to the welfare of the state that its citizens should be educated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this subject in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on this subject.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much, in view of what has been done on the other side, that I shall have to object.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask five minutes additional time for the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is the gentleman's privilege and it is my privilege to ask it.

Mr. PAYNE. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

For principals of normal, high, and manual training schools, nine in all, at a minimum salary of $2,000 each.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill why the language "minimum salary" is used all along through this paragraph?

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman it is because under the law we have a graduated salary. At first teachers are appointed at a minimum salary and then they are gradually increased.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Is there an affirmative limitation in the statute taking care of the amount of salary?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. So this minimum proposition does not make it unlimited?

Mr. MADDEN. No; that is to be appropriated for under the law and then a lump-sum appropriation to take care of the increases as they come along.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. In other words, there is existing legislation that makes these salaries definite?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

For assistant directors of music, drawing, physical culture, domestic science, domestic art, and kindergartens, six in all, at a minimum salary of $1,300 each.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This principle is universally recognized in public education throughout the United States——

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that the gentleman from Massachusetts is not speaking to his amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I submit the gentleman has not said enough to indicate whether he is speaking to it or not, and the gentleman from New York is making the point of order without any basis of fact.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman is talking upon a child-labor bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the gentleman raises the point of order without any knowledge. He is simply assuming what the gentleman is speaking to——

Mr. PAYNE. That is hardly worthy of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think it is equally as worthy as the interruption of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Kentucky heard what the gentleman said——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether he is continuing the speech which he started to make.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, what I intend to say bears on the subject of this paragraph. The first line in the paragraph says, "for directors of music, drawing, physical culture, domestic science, domestic art." Taking up physical culture, what I shall have to say bears very directly, Mr. Chairman, on that subject. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This principle is universally recognized by public education throughout the United States, but in allowing the employment of children most of the States have fallen to the cupidity of certain manufacturers, and the temptation of poor families to exploit their children for their own benefit by sending them to work without an education has proven too much for them. The omission of education is a disregard of one of the essential protections of democracy. To protect itself the State should see that these children are prevented from working at an age which precludes them from getting an education and which also inevitably injures them physically, developing from children who are exploited in the unrestricted hours of the factory men and women lacking in education and broken down in body who are unable properly to bear the responsibilities of citizenship and who handicap by their development the progress of our country.

The discrepancies in State laws also work a great unfairness in allowing manufacturers who have factories where children are exploited to compete on equal terms with their products against the products of factories in States where proper child-labor regulation exists, and not alone the State, but the United States as a whole, suffers by the inadequate development of the children in poorly protected jurisdictions.

The United States stands to-day far behind the rest of the civilized world in the protection of its children. It is in the stage of England of many years ago. There are many reforms to-day in which opinions may differ and views fail to coincide, but child-labor regulation is one of many proposed reforms upon which all can agree and which must appeal to every right-thinking person and the demand for which is most urgent. Reform can be accomplished only through the enactment of legislation by Congress for the territory under its jurisdiction and by the various States for their own territories. Child-labor laws can be passed and their terms be made effective only by the support of an enlightened public sentiment in their favor. Congress should act in this matter not alone for the sake of the protection of the children of the District of Columbia, but also to support and aid by its example an enlightened public sentiment throughout the country which is endeavoring in the various States to bring about for our children the enactment of proper legislation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, for teachers, $1,283,925.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment:

On page 42, strike out the word "eighty-three," commencing in line 25, and insert in lieu thereof the word "forty-five."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 42, strike out the word "eighty-three," commencing in line 25, and insert in lieu thereof the word "forty-five."

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, it is simply to correct the total. It is an error in printing the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That the salaries of all teachers and clerks and librarians in the high and manual training schools, duly elected, whose services commence with the opening day of school and who shall perform their duties, shall begin on the 1st day of September and shall be paid in ten monthly installments, the first payment to be made on the 1st day of October, or as near that date as practicable, and the payment for the month of June to be made upon the completion of the school term in June: Provided, That the salaries of other teachers shall begin when they enter upon their duties.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that section for the purpose of obtaining information. I believe, as the report discloses, this is a new provision in the pending appropriation bill.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It is simply ratifying what has been the usage, in connection with another provision following, for years.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman explain why the distinction in limiting this to teachers and clerks and librarians in the high and manual training schools and not extending it to the teachers of the graded schools?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It says, "All teachers and clerks and librarians." "Teachers," it should be. That is an error. It is not properly punctuated. It should read, "That the salaries of all teachers," and then a comma should be inserted, and then read "and clerks and librarians in the high and manual training schools." It is intended to include all teachers.

Mr. STAFFORD. In reading the provision I gained the impression that the provision was limited merely to the teachers in the high and manual training schools, and am now assured by the chairman of the committee that there was no such purpose, and that it was intended to apply to all teachers without regard to their being in the high schools or the graded schools. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, to remove any doubt I move to amend, on line 19, "that the salaries of all teachers," after the word "teachers" to insert a comma. That makes the meaning clear, as was intended by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 44, line 19, after the word "teachers," insert a comma.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, at this point I desire to insert the following:

On page 45, after line 2, insert:
"No part of any money appropriated by this act shall be paid to teachers in group B of class 6 who are not heads of departments of high and manual training schools.
"Hereafter no promotions or transfers shall be made from group A to group B in class 6, except the teachers to be heads of departments in high and manual training schools."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER] offers an amendment which the Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

"No part of any money appropriated by this act shall be paid to teachers in group B in class 6 who are not heads of departments in high and manual training schools.
"Hereafter no promotions or transfers shall be made from group A to group B in class 6, except the teachers to be the heads of departments in high and manual training schools."

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Under the law it says, "heads of departments in high and manual training schools, group B, class 6." This is the highest class, running from $1,900 to $2,200. Now, we find that there have been transfers from group A, class 6, to group B, class 6—for example, of nine teachers.

Mr. GARRETT. Is that a committee amendment?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes, sir; the subcommittee. There are now, we understand, ten persons slated to be transferred from this group A, class 6, to group B, class 6. Some of these transfers have been made from lower salaries—as low, I am told, as $1,100 in group A to $1,900 in group B; so that while the law intends to provide that they shall be eight years in reaching the maximum of group A, under this process of transfer they can reach the maximum of $2,200 in group B in four years, defeating the very purpose of the law.

Mr. MANN. We have a very liberal law in regard to the pay of teachers and principals. Does this extend the liberality of the law or restrict it?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It is to carry out the spirit of the law, as I understand it.

Mr. MANN. I know; but nobody knows what the spirit of the law is, as I understand.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It simply restricts the transfer from group A, class 6, into group B, class 6, which is the highest class. In other words, there may be in time as many as 200 transfers from group A, class 6, to group B, class 6.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter the following rules for division of time and computation of pay for services rendered are hereby established: Compensations of teachers and librarians and clerks in the high and manual training schools shall be divided into ten equal installments, one of which shall be paid for each school month, and in making payments for a fractional part of a month one-thirtieth of one of such installments shall be the daily rate of pay. For the purpose of computing such compensation and for computing time for services rendered during a fractional part of a month in connection with the compensation of teachers and librarians and clerks in the high and manual training schools, each and every month shall be held to consist of thirty days, without regard to the actual number of days in any calendar month, thus excluding the 31st day of any calendar month from the computation and treating February as if it actually had thirty days. Any person entering the service of the schools during a thirty-one day month and serving until the end thereof shall be entitled to pay for that month from the date of entry to the 30th day of said month, both days inclusive; and any person entering said service during the month of February and serving until the end thereof shall be entitled to one month's pay, less as many thirtieths thereof as there were days elapsed prior to the date of entry: Provided, That for one day's unauthorized absence on the 31st day of any calendar month one day's pay shall be forfeited.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order. May I ask the gentleman if this is the exact provision now in the law in reference to Government employees?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, this is simply a restatement of the usage for years.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, the gentleman is mistaken about that. It is not the usage. We enacted a law, I think, about two or three years ago as to Government employees generally. Will the gentleman inform us, is that a reproduction of that law?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. If you will allow me, I will say that this simply carries forward the custom of paying teachers that has been followed for many years. There is no variation, but it puts it beyond cavil.

Mr. MANN. What is the object of putting it in the law?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. We simply put it where there can be no cavil.

Mr. MANN. It reads to me very much like the law that was put into operation two or three years ago, containing the proposition that all Government employees who are paid on division of twelve months of thirty days a month, regardless of the number of days in the month, which law, while in the main correct, works a very great hardship in many cases, and the Comptroller has repeatedly requested that it should be amended. I am not willing that they should put it in the same form.

Mr. MADDEN. When Mr. Tweedale, the auditor for the District, was before the committee—it will be found on page 177 of the hearings—he said:

The practice has been, since the old appropriation, to pay the teachers in tenths, and when the question was presented to the Comptroller he held that they were in a class by themselves, not a part of the Federal Government, and therefore he did not feel like disturbing the practice that had existed for all of these years. For that reason he said that payment in tenths was legalized by custom.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the payment in tenths, and that is the custom, but this provision goes away beyond that. That is not it at all. On page 46, line 2, there is a reproduction of existing law in reference to the payment on the basis of thirty days a month and twelve months in the year, regardless of the actual number of days, and cutting off anyone who works on the 31st of the month.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The teacher gets the month's pay; and the teacher knows when he enters into the contract just exactly what he gets.

Mr. MANN. Some time ago I prepared a brief on this subject, based upon the decision of the Comptroller, which shows how completely inadequate the law is as it now stands. In many cases it pays a man twice where he works only one day, and in many cases pays nothing at all where they work a day.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me, I will say that the Comptroller has held that the law to which he makes reference does not apply to schoolteachers.

Mr. MANN. That is exactly the reason you are putting it in here.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. What other object have you for putting it in?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Simply, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has stated, that the auditor for the District of Columbia says it fixes the time. Beyond any question the school-teacher knows precisely what he is to receive when he enters upon a contract.

Mr. MANN. Now, I will say to the gentleman that if he will read the decisions of the Comptroller in reference to the construction of the existing law he will ascertain that no employee can tell what he is going to receive during the course of a year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. This same question was submitted to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads when the difficulty of paying substitutes who entered the service on the 31st day of a month having thirty-one days was presented; and last year, if I remember correctly, not only in the post-office appropriation bill, but also in the general deficiency bill, which was reported by the Committee on Appropriations, there was a provision carried which perfected the original law of two years ago, whereby that hardship was obviated. I can readily see where there is need of having such a provision carried in this bill, but I do not see where there is provision made for the payment of substitutes, and I should like to ask the chairman of the committee what the method is for the payment for substitutes for teachers who are absent from service on the 31st day of the month? That was the difficulty that confronted the postal service.

Mr. MANN. They get no pay.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Such a teacher will get one-thirtieth of a part of a month's pay, because the teacher for whom he substitutes can not possibly get more than thirty days' pay if he serves thirty-one days. He does not serve the full thirty-one days, and therefore his substitute would get one-thirtieth of a month's pay.

Mr. MANN. Suppose a teacher serves thirty days. Under this provision that teacher is entitled to a full month's pay for thirty days' service.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. No.

Mr. MANN. Your provision says so.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. No; thirty days make a month for that teacher, but in that month he is required to serve thirty-one days. Now, he does not serve the thirty-one days, but he does serve thirty days. Therefore his substitute would receive one-thirtieth of the pay for thirty-one days' service.

Mr. STAFFORD. This, as I understand it, is merely for the convenience of bookkeeping?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That is all.

Mr. STAFFORD. To aid the auditor in the payment of school-teachers' accounts?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It is at the request of the auditor.

Mr. MANN. I think I shall withdraw the point of order. I withdrew it when the provision went into the general law, and very much regretted afterwards that I had done so, because I have a stack of Comptroller's decisions explaining how that law works to the detriment of the employees of the Government and to the dismay of the accounting officers of the Government.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I am very glad to have the gentleman withdraw the point of order, because there is a difference between the payment of the regular employees and the payment of the school employees in that respect.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Night schools: For night schools for pupils (and teachers and janitors of night schools may also be teachers and janitors of day schools), $10,000.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of getting some information from the chairman of the committee in relation to teachers who are employed for day service and night service. I should like to know of the chairman if it is the practice in the District of Columbia to employ teachers to teach during the day and also to teach at night, and whether or not it is regarded as good practice.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It is the custom to do that, and not only that, but it is really necessary in order to get competent teachers for the night schools.

Mr. ADAIR. Does the chairman think that a teacher who teaches during the day is competent to teach also at night?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. If he or she be competent to teach during the day, and in good health, just like anybody else who can work overtime without injury, if necessary.

Mr. ADAIR. Is the supply of teachers so limited that teachers for night schools can not be obtained?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Of course, a teacher could not give his or her time simply to teaching at night, but must have some other occupation besides. Now, a teacher who teaches during the day, being qualified by common consent for teaching, is qualified for teaching at night, if he or she has the physical endurance, that is all.

Mr. ADAIR. If they are physically able to stand the work.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes; and the presumption is that they are, for they have been doing successful work for years.

Mr. ADAIR. Well, if it is successfully done, all right. It occurred to me that a teacher who taught school during the day was hardly in a condition to teach at night.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Perhaps I ought to say that the night school lasts but two hours. They do not have a long session.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I would like to ask the gentleman what proportion of the teachers engaged in the schools during the day are also engaged in teaching night schools?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. A very small per cent.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, in answer to the question propounded by the gentleman from Indiana, that in the city of New York we have discussed fully this matter of providing a different set of teachers for the day and night schools and found it impracticable to do so, and hence we were obliged to take the day school-teachers to do the same duty at night, and we found it worked successfully and to our entire satisfaction.

Mr. ADAIR. I have no objection, Mr. Chairman, if the teachers can do the work.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Michigan explain what the method is for the payment of substitutes in place of teachers absent without leave?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The pay is in thirtieths.

Mr. STAFFORD. Suppose they work on the 31st of the month; what is their compensation?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I endeavored to explain that. If the substitute works on the 31st day of the month, he or she would receive one-thirtieth of a month's salary, because thirty days to the teacher make a month and not thirty-one.

The Clerk read as follows:

For one assistant engineer at the McKinley Manual Training School, $600.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of inquiring of the gentleman in charge of the bill what qualifications are required of the assistant engineer mentioned on page 47, line 8—"assistant engineer to the manual training school." What are his duties?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. He must of necessity be a competent engineer who has demonstrated to the proper committee, by whom he was examined, that he possesses those qualifications. Specifically what he must do I am unable to say.

Mr. MURPHY. Is he an instructor in manual training?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes; I so understand it.

Mr. MURPHY. Is he required to have a license other than the license he receives from this board of engineers in the District, or any other qualifications?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. He would have a license for a stationary engineer because he has to do or may have to do with stationary engines in the course of his instructions.

Mr. MURPHY. It strikes me that it is requiring rather limited qualifications in a man to instruct in the manual training school.

Mr. MADDEN. These engineers are not all instructors.

Mr. MURPHY. So the gentleman from Michigan informs me.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Those under discussion are instructors, but the gentleman from Wisconsin will bear in mind that they must have all the mental qualifications to enable them to teach in the department of which they make a specialty, plus a technical knowledge of the thing they propose to teach.

Mr. MURPHY. I will say to the gentleman that I judge from the wording in line 9, page 47, that no very great mental qualifications can be required of a man who only gets a salary of $600. It strikes me that we are giving poor instruction or——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think that this man is an instructor.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. He is an assistant instructor.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think they are instructed; they are only janitors. They may be assistant instructors, but they are only employed a short time during the day.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Let me read:

For one engineer and instructor in steam engineering at the McKinley Manual Training School, $1,200.

Now, the point under discussion follows:

For one assistant engineer at the McKinley Manual Training School, $600.

He is an assistant to the engineer and an instructor; hence he may be called to be an assistant in instruction, and he ought to be qualified. As to the matter of salary, he can grow in salary if he continues in the service.

Mr. MURPHY. I would like to ask the gentleman what provision there is for him to grow in salary. I do not desire to embarrass the gentleman if he has not the information at hand.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman refer to the assistant engineer?

Mr. MURPHY. There are a number of engineers provided for in the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. This particular one that the gentleman has reference to is not an instructor at all. He is simply an assistant engineer.

Mr. MURPHY. The same thing occurs later on as to all the schools.

Mr. MADDEN. All the engineers and assistant engineers in the school service are required to have a license and to pass an examination as to their qualifications as engineers. They are required to know just exactly how to operate an engine, how to put it together and take it apart, and how to do everything connected with an engineer's service, and they can not be a party to the service unless they have these qualifications.

Mr. MURPHY. I thank the gentleman for the information.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fuel, gas, and electric light and power, $85,000.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer, but before offering it I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I would like to know what part of that $85,000 is for gas.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, in response I will say that I do not know how much, but not a very large percentage.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Is all of this gas provided for in this appropriation used in the school buildings of the District of Columbia, or is it used in the District generally?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It is used over the entire District of Columbia. This bill makes provisions for the schools of the entire District, and, of course, light follows a building wherever electricity or gas can be used.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Does this provide for contract gas? I am not very familiar with this, but I wish the gentleman would explain how the gas is purchased here in this city.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. At $1 a thousand feet.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Then it is not under contract—by the year?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Not for the school purposes, but for lighting the streets it is under contract.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. One dollar per thousand.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. For streets it is under contract at so much a light. For school purposes it is paid by the thousand cubic feet.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Then in all the buildings of the Government it is purchased at the rate of $1 per thousand cubic feet?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. So I understand. They pay, in other words, for what they use.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," on page 50, line 21, add the following: "Provided, That no part of this sum so appropriated shall be expended for gas at a greater price than 75 cents per thousand cubic feet."

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order, or rather I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I have authorities here, if the gentleman desires to discuss the point of order.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I simply want to hear the gentleman's reasons for offering the amendment.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have been looking into this question of gas a little of late, and it seems to me that the people in the District of Columbia and the people outside, who pay a part of this appropriation to conduct the business here, pay entirely too much for gas. There are many cities in this country where the gas is sold at a much less rate than it is in the District of Columbia. Take the city of Milwaukee. There they pay only 60 cents. In Cincinnati they pay only 50 cents a thousand cubic feet, and in Cleveland 60 cents a thousand cubic feet, and in St. Louis 60 cents a thousand cubic feet.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. What is the candlepower of gas in those different cities?

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I do not know; but the population is about the same as it is here. I know of no reason why the people in this city and the people of the nation generally who pay half the expenses of this Government should pay any more than the people in these other cities.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the gentleman take the position that it does not make any difference what the candlepower is, so far as the price is concerned?

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. No; I do not take that position. I understand from authorities in the Census Bureau of this Government that gas can be made and sold at a profit at 40 cents per thousand cubic feet; and if that is so, I see no reason why the people should pay $1 a thousand cubic feet for gas in this city. I know that in the city of Chicago gas is much cheaper than it is here, and in many other cities. I have a large list of cities where the gas is sold at much less than a dollar per thousand cubic feet. It seems to me that the people in this city are paying more than they ought to pay, and it seems to me it is the duty of every Member of Congress to see that the appropriation for the District of Columbia is cut down as much as possible. We pay a part of this appropriation—that is, the people outside of the District—for the District pays only one-half, and it is our duty, it seems to me, to see that any extravagant price that is paid should be reduced.

Mr. ADAIR. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Gladly.

Mr. ADAIR. I should just like to ask, Is this gas furnished by a local company?

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I understand so; yes.

Mr. ADAIR. Suppose we reduce the appropriation to 75 cents per thousand feet and this company would refuse to furnish the gas at that price; what would the schools do?

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I would like to have the company refuse to furnish gas to the schools of this city or any other city in this country on that account.

Mr. ADAIR. Does the gentleman understand by reducing this appropriation and fixing this amount at 75 cents a thousand feet that it would compel the gas company to furnish gas at that price?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I am frank to say I believe without a doubt that the gas companies of this city would furnish the schools of this city gas at 75 cents a thousand feet if this Congress adopted the amendment which I have introduced at this time.

Mr. ADAIR. I am heartily in favor of the amendment, and I think the company ought to furnish it at 75 cents a thousand feet, but I would not like to adopt an amendment that will embarrass the schools in the event they can not get the gas.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I do not believe that schools will be embarrassed nearly so much as the gas company might be embarrassed. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman understands it would not close the day schools.

Mr. ADAIR. Only might interfere with the night schools.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I have an interesting report that has been filed in Congress to show something about the profits of this gas company which might be of interest to some Members of this House, and as it is only a few lines I will read what I have here. I will not take the time to read it, but from some calculations which I have made I have found the dividends which the gas companies here in Washington paid in thirteen years were 305 per cent. In one year they paid 55 per cent, in another year they paid 60 per cent, in another 15 per cent, in another year 10 per cent, and that was the lowest paid in any one year.

Mr. SCOTT. That is on the capitalization?

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. Does the gentleman know what proportion the capitalization bears to the property?

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I do. I understand from the investigation which I have made that it is overcapitalized now. The company originally was capitalized for $50,000, $42,500 of which was paid in, and then it was increased until it is at its present capitalization.

Mr. SCOTT. Of what?

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I have forgotten the exact amount.

Mr. BOWERS. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois what is the present capitalization?

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I was just looking for that.

Mr. BOWERS. The gentleman's colleague advises me it is $2,600,000.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I was about to remark it is $3,000,000 or $2,600,000.

Mr. MURPHY. I would like to ask the gentleman one question, which may explain this a little. Is it not a fact that they are now asking to have a large increase in the capital stock legalized?

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I was just about to remark about that. They are; and they have had bills before Congress for many sessions just for that purpose, for the purpose of legalizing an increase of the capital stock of that company.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Would the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Would the gentleman's investigation enable him to state to the committee what the real value of the property of these companies is?

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. No; I can not state as to that; but I understand that the real value of this property and all improvements of the property have been made and paid for out of the profits of the gas company, besides the dividends that have been paid.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like the gentleman to give——

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know under what rule we are proceeding? I supposed it was the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois had his time extended by unanimous consent.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like the gentleman [Mr. WILSON] to give the figures for the thirteen years of which he spoke.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I can give some of them. In 1874 they paid a dividend of 55 per cent; in 1875, 20 per cent; in 1876, 60 per cent; in 1878, 15 per cent; in 1879, 15 per cent; in 1880, 15 per cent; in 1881, 10 per cent; in 1882, 10 per cent; in 1883, 50 per cent; in 1884, 10 per cent; in 1885, 12½ per cent; in 1894, 10 per cent; in 1896, 23 per cent. I was unable to get all of the years and the per cent of the dividends that they paid during all the time.

Mr. GOULDEN. Has the gentleman anything later than 1896?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I will not press the point further, but I would like to say the situation resolves itself into this: We have agreed to pay a dollar a thousand for gas. Not only that, but in making that agreement we simply follow the law. Now, the gentleman does not propose to change the law by his amendment. He simply proposes to pay 75 per cent of the stipulated price, which is fixed by statute.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I limit it.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Of what we have agreed to pay—100 per cent.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Will the gentleman submit to a question? Have you contracted with the gas company at a dollar a thousand for the year, or do you take the same position that all the people in Washington do in paying a dollar a thousand each month, according to the meter?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. As I understand it, the law requires the payment of a dollar a thousand. We have no election in the matter.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman cite us to that law?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I am told an independent law passed five or six years ago touching this subject.

Mr. MANN. Does the law require us to buy gas?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. No, sir; but it requires——

Mr. MANN. Then, if the law does not require us to buy gas, can not we say how much we shall pay for gas?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. And to pay the price fixed.

Mr. MANN. We have not bought any gas for the next fiscal year, have we?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Does not the law simply provide that we shall not charge exceeding $1 per thousand? In other words, the law limits the gas company in the charges that it can make for gas, but the law does not say that anybody shall pay that price.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Can you cite the law for that? I wish you would.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It was a law that we passed on the subject. We limited the gas company's right to charge the people in excess of a dollar a thousand.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT] is a member of a committee that has been investigating this subject, and I assume that he is fresh upon the points of law and of fact in the case. I would like to hear from him.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that there are any particular points of law involved in the matter, but I do think it is unfortunate at this time to have this matter come up. As a matter of fact, the District of Columbia Committee, through a subcommittee, is now investigating the entire question, their action being predicated on a bill that has been introduced to reduce the price of gas to 75 cents. Now, it seems to me, to put this on this appropriation bill when there is to be a hearing granted to citizens of Washington is an unfortunate thing. I am just as much in favor as any of the gentlemen from Illinois of reducing the price of gas.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Does not the gentleman think that if this amendment was adopted by the House, it would be a great benefit to him in the hearings?

Mr. OLCOTT. I think if this amendment was adopted by the House there would not be much use for our having any further hearings. I think that might do a considerable injustice.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman understand what the amendment is?

Mr. OLCOTT. The amendment is a provision, as I understand it, that no more than 75 cents shall be paid for gas.

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman was mistaken. The provision is that in the schools the Government shall not pay more than 75 cents for its gas. It does not affect the general proposition.

Mr. OLCOTT. Then, if it comes to that question, I am absolutely opposed to the Government of the United States getting their gas cheaper than the citizens of the city of Washington.

Mr. MANN. Even though it equaled the price to the citizens?

Mr. OLCOTT. I do not want the Government to have its price reduced if the price to the citizen is not reduced.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is not willing to take a part if he does not get all of it at once?

Mr. OLCOTT. I am unwilling to have this matter come up in this way when it is being orderly and expeditiously treated in the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that when the Government gives the gas company the use of the streets, the title of which is in the Government, the Government might properly exact gas at a lower rate than the citizens who do not furnish the streets?

Mr. OLCOTT. No; I am not willing to say that, because the people of the country own the streets.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not believe, then, in a tax upon public utilities?

Mr. OLCOTT. Yes; I do.

Mr. MANN. The tax always goes to the Government, and not to the citizen.

Mr. OLCOTT. That is not the point at all.

Mr. MANN. That is the exact proposition here. What is the difference between the paying a tax of money for the use of the streets and paying a tax in the reduction of the charge to the Government for the use of the street?

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, that is quite a different proposition. I have no hesitation in saying that I believe there will be a reduction in the price of gas made necessary by an act of Congress in this Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has the floor.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to yield to any gentleman; I have nothing further to say on the subject.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question before he sits down?

Mr. OLCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I understand the gentleman to say that the gas question is being investigated in an orderly and proper way in the District Committee or some other committee. Can the gentleman inform the House when we will probably have an opportunity to pass upon a bill in an orderly way?

Mr. OLCOTT. My own personal belief is, although I can not say exactly what the committee will do, that the fourth Monday of April will see a gas bill on the Calendar. That is the best we can do. We could get it earlier if we did not have so much to do.

Mr. MANN. That will go along as rapidly into enactment as universal transfer has gone.

Mr. OLCOTT. I have nothing to do with that. That is a matter more with the Senate than the House.

Mr. MADDEN. I move to strike out the last word.

It has been stated here that the government of the District has a contract with the gas company for the gas it uses. The fact is that the government has no contract for any given price for any gas that is consumed in the schools of the District. The government, unfortunately, has a contract under which it is obliged to pay for the gas it consumes in the street lamps at a price far in excess of what is believed to be an equitable price. The District Subcommittee on Appropriations last year in the consideration of this question fixed the maximum price that could be paid for gas for street lighting purposes at 75 cents a thousand. Prior to that time the District paid a dollar a thousand for all gas it consumed in the street lamps. All of the lamps that were lighted by gas were of the open-flame burner character, except thirty-six lamps. Those thirty-six lamps at the time this price was fixed had what is known as "incandescent mantles" attached to them. For incandescent mantle lamps a price of $22.40 a year, or something like that, was paid. When the committee inquired why all the lamps were not incandescent mantle lamps, it was stated that the gas company of the District did not own the incandescent mantle, that it could not buy it, and that the District Commissioners were obliged to contract with an outside company that controlled the incandescent mantle. A contract was let to this company to furnish the gas, and this company bought the gas from the gas company and furnished it to the District of Columbia. It was stated to the District Commissioners that the mantle could be bought by anybody, but they denied the statement. However, a contract was authorized to be let for open-flame burners at 75 cents a thousand. That price was modified when it went to the Senate. I do not remember the exact price which the two Houses agreed upon for gas street lighting, but it was less than a dollar. When the Appropriation Committee met the succeeding year it found that all the streets of Washington were lighted with the incandescent mantle lamps at the high price; and when inquiry was made as to why this change took place, the committee was informed by the District Commissioners that they had authority under the law to let the contract for three years instead of one year; and they took advantage of their right under that law to evade the reduction in the price of gas made by Congress and paid the higher price to the gas company through the authority to light the streets with the incandescent mantle lamp.

Now, an open-flame lamp burns 5 feet of gas per hour. The average number of hours per year these lamps are burned in the city of Washington is 4,000. Four thousand multiplied by five would make 20,000 feet of gas. Twenty thousand feet of gas at a dollar would be $20. That was the price that had been uniformly charged for these lamps. An incandescent mantle lamp burns 3½ cubic feet an hour. Four thousand hours would make the amount 14,000 feet per annum. At the price of a dollar a thousand feet that would make these lamps worth only $14 a year, whereas under the contract they are paying something over $20 per annum for them. So that instead of reducing the price, as Congress thought it was when it enacted that law, the Commissioners by entering into these contracts have evaded the instruction given to them by Congress.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. This contract, into which the District Commissioners have entered with the gas company for the sole purpose, it must be concluded, of paying a higher price than Congress wanted to pay, will expire at the conclusion of the next fiscal year. There is a provision in this bill which seeks to repeal the authority of the District Commissioners to enter into a contract for a longer period than one year at any one time, and if the House and Senate agree with the recommendations made by the District subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, next year the House will be able to do with street lighting what is proposed to be done by the amendment offered by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. WILSON] with relation to the schools.

Now, there is a vast difference between selling gas to the District of Columbia and selling it to a private individual. It requires several hundreds, yes, thousands, of private individuals to make up the amount paid to the gas company by the District government. Where the gas company has only one bill to make out to the District government it may have 5,000 bills to make out to the people of the District to make up the same amount of money. It costs vastly less to sell to a great consumer than it does to a small consumer. Every house into which gas is supplied must have a meter. This meter costs money.

You can not buy a meter for less than $11, and they run up as high as $100; so that every time the gas company connects its pipes with a small residence it has to expend a lot of money in order that it may be able to measure the commodity that it furnishes to this residence, whereas it has no such investment to make for the gas supplied to the District government. Each lamp fixes the quantity of gas consumed. The burner on the lamp measures the amount it burns, and the gas company knows beyond any question whatever exactly how much gas it furnishes to the District government, and it does not care whether it furnishes more or less to a private individual, because whatever it furnishes is measured by the meter. Now, it is compelled to furnish not only clerk hire, but stationery, collectors, meters, and pipe connections, as well as readers of the meters, in the furnishing of gas to private consumers, whereas the company makes a lump-sum bill to the District government.

The District government gives life to the gas company. It owns breathing power. It should be able to control its method of breathing. It ought to able to control the price that it pays to this monopoly. This gas company has a capitalization of $2,600,000, on which my colleague says it has paid more than 300 per cent in dividends in thirteen years. It has $2,600,000 of unfunded debt—certificate debt, if you please, capitalization unauthorized—and on which it pays dividends in the form of interest. It has this capitalization without a dollar of investment. To say that the people of the District of Columbia have no right to demand honest treatment and fair prices is to say that the government of the District of Columbia is owned and controlled by the gas monopoly, and I do not think anyone would be willing to concede that.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I think there is no difference of opinion among the members of the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee of the Whole as to the desirability of having gas furnished at 75 cents a thousand; but as the question has arisen about the law in the case, I should like to read from the statute, as follows:

> After the 1st day of July, 1896, the Washington Gaslight Company of the District of Columbia shall furnish to the United States Government and the District of Columbia gas at the rate of $1 per thousand cubic feet.

It is not a sliding scale, as the gentleman from South Carolina suggested.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me a question right there?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to know whether the gentleman concludes, from the reading of that statute, that the Government or the District of Columbia is obliged to pay the price that the company is authorized to collect?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The law fixes the price. Neither the Government nor the District of Columbia is obliged to use any gas.

But if you use the gas, and the law fixes the price of the gas, you are compelled to pay the price until the law is changed, or a suit would lie for breach of contract, would it not?

Mr. MANN. Let us have the suit, then.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Does not the statute that the gentleman is reading from provide the maximum amount that the gas company shall charge, and any sums under that amount, of course, would be acceptable?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I will read it again; it is as plain as language can make it:

> After the 1st of July, 1896, the Washington Gas Light Company of the District of Columbia shall furnish to the United States Government and to the District of Columbia gas at the rate—
> Not more, nor less—
> at the rate of $1 per thousand cubic feet.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. They will furnish gas at that rate, but there is nothing in the law to prohibit or prevent them from selling it to the people in the District of Columbia for less than $1 per thousand feet.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It is not permissive—it is mandatory. It says "shall."

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Mandatory that the gas company shall not charge more than $1 per thousand, but that is not mandatory on the gas company that it shall not sell gas cheaper or offer it for less than a dollar a thousand.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The gentleman does not do himself justice when he says that the law says they shall not charge more. It does not say that they shall not charge more, and it does not say that they shall not charge less. It says they shall furnish it at $1 per thousand cubic feet.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield for a question?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to put a question which I think states the legal status. The company has the right to charge $1 per thousand feet to the Government. On the other hand, the Government has the right, as any individual has, to say to the company, "I will take your gas if you will furnish it at 75 cents per thousand." The company can do one of two things—it can refuse to furnish the gas on the offer made to pay 75 cents and no more, but if it furnishes the gas, it can only collect the 75 cents. Its remedy is, if it is not willing to sell gas at that price, to say "We will furnish no gas," and the Government could not compel them to furnish it. Any man has a right to say "I will give you so much for your commodity," and if you do not want to sell it at that price you can refuse to sell it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I ask that my time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. We contend for nothing else. The law fixes the price, Congress fixes the price at $1 per thousand feet. There is no qualification. Now, we can take the gas at that price or not, as we see fit.

Mr. PERKINS. Suppose you say that we will take it at 75 cents, and pay no more. The company must furnish the gas at that price or furnish none.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. We do not need the amendment in order to do that.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to inquire whether there is any existing contract between the District of Columbia or the school authorities and the gas company requiring the gas to be furnished by the company?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I do not so understand it. As has been explained earlier in the debate upon this question, the District pays for gas for school purposes for what it uses as registered by the meters.

Mr. KEIFER. That is all right; but is there a contract which requires the company to furnish gas under the law?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Not for school purposes, but there is for street purposes.

Mr. KEIFER. Is not that all there is of the question? If the school authorities do use the gas without a contract, they must pay by law $1.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. There is no question about it in my mind. It is absolutely fixed by the statute.

Mr. KEIFER. The school authorities might make a contract, if they could, for a less price.

Mr. MANN. What law is it that the gentleman from Michigan refers to?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The act of July 1, 1901.

Mr. MANN. That is an act amendatory?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It is an act "relating to the sale of gas in the District of Columbia."

Mr. MANN. That is an act amendatory of the gas charter, a requirement on the gas company in an amendment to their charter.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That does not change the right to change that rate, if we fix the rate at a dollar a thousand.

Mr. MANN. It changes the relationship of the law very decidedly.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It says, "shall furnish to the United States Government gas at $1 per 1,000 cubic feet."

Mr. MANN. That is a requirement upon the gas company only. Before that they charged more. Here was a requirement upon the gas company. There is no requirement that the Government shall pay $1 a thousand.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. But, supposing the gentleman had brought in his amendment to charge but 75 cents a thousand, a change of existing law; that would have gone out in a moment.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. We can do the same thing without the amendment as with it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. If we endeavor to say to the gas company that they must furnish gas at 75 cents a thousand, that is an amendment of their charter, which, if it is not confiscatory, they must comply with; but we can say to them, We will pay you only 75 cents, and they are not compelled to furnish the gas. In the one case they must comply, and on the other hand they need not do it.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. On this general subject, to recur to the remarks made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT], the matter is now under careful investigation by the committee to which it properly belongs. We have this statement that it will be brought before the House in a bill within a comparatively short time and take its place on the Calendar, and, I have no doubt, become a law—to use the gentleman's own words—"in an orderly way." I hope that the amendment will not prevail, for this reason.

Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri. I move to strike out the last two words. The gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT] says this bill will come in from the Committee on the District of Columbia about the last of April and take its place on the Calendar, and he might as well have said died in the ordinary course of human events.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; it is a District bill, and would have right of way.

Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri. There can not be any question here that this is a limitation on an appropriation and is not subject to a point of order. This is a splendid time to get the opinion of this House on this question. It has been mooted through the public press and discussed from time to time since Congress assembled. I think the opinion is universal that the company is charging too much for gas. This amendment simply provides that the school board shall not pay more than 75 cents for gas. The law simply provides that the company shall not charge more than $1 for gas. The company may charge less.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It does not say that.

Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri. Now, the school board would be authorized to pay only 75 cents, and if the company is not willing to furnish the gas at 75 cents, then the board must provide some other means of illumination. That is all there is to it.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That is right.

Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri. Under the circumstances, I say it is a good time for this body to put itself on record in favor of 75-cent gas. Only a little, I imagine, is used for these night schools, and we might dispense with it altogether if we could, under this amendment, get favorable expression of the House on this question.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this amendment and I hope it will be adopted. During this session we have seen in one of the papers of this city, the Times—true, it was not the principal morning paper, as it is understood that the proprietor of the gas company is one of the chief owners of the morning paper of the city—many leading editorials and attacks upon the gas company of the District, in which it was demonstrated, to me, at least, that the city was paying more for gas than it ought to. The gas is furnished by a company which is chartered by the representatives of the people, and it is a monopoly in the capital of the nation. This amendment is a simple thing in its way. It is simply intended to be an entering wedge, that the people of the District may understand that Congress is of a mind to give them relief from the extortionate prices now made upon the entire people of the District as well as upon the Government in the price charged for gas. This amendment simply provides that the school board shall not pay more than 75 cents per 1,000 cubic feet of gas, which is acknowledged to be a reasonable price. It is but a small attack upon a gigantic monopoly, and I trust that the House, having this opportunity to give expression to its views, will let it be known that when the opportunity shall be offered properly we will give to the people of the District of Columbia and of the Government relief from the extortion they are now subjected to from this monopoly in the furnishing of gas to the Government and the people.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. NEEDHAM having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 17288. An act making appropriation for support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase of pianos for school buildings and kindergarten schools, at an average cost not to exceed $225 each, $1,000.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee especially in charge of this bill, as well as the Committee of the Whole House, to a bill introduced by myself known as "H. R. 16971," providing for a superintendent of buildings and supplies on the board of education for the city of Washington, D. C. That bill, it seems to me, in looking over the various appropriations for improvements, repairs, supplies, and so forth, which run up to over a quarter of a million of dollars yearly that there should be some steps taken in the direction of having a responsible head to look after these important matters. Here you are expending a large sum each year for these various items without anyone directly responsible for it or anyone to look after it carefully, as should be done. This bill provides as follows:

That a superintendent of buildings and supplies shall be appointed by the board of education of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, whose compensation shall be $3,000 per annum, as hereinafter provided, and who shall give bond for at least $10,000 and such additional security for the faithful performance of the duties of his office as the said board of education shall prescribe. He shall be an architect or civil engineer. He shall be responsible for the condition and care of all school buildings and premises. He shall appoint such deputies and other subordinates as are hereinafter provided, and shall possess, so far as applicable, all powers and rights respecting the appointment and transfer of the same as are conferred upon the superintendents of schools with respect to his subordinates by this act. The subordinates to the superintendent of buildings and supplies, including janitors, engineers, their assistants and helpers, shall receive compensation as provided for by the board of education of the District of Columbia, or as prescribed by act of Congress, and shall discharge their duties under the direction and to the satisfaction of the superintendent of buildings and supplies: Provided, That individuals performing such duties as are assigned to subordinates of the superintendent of buildings and supplies under the provisions of this act, including janitors, engineers, their helpers and assistants, employed in the public schools of the District of Columbia at the time of the passage of this act, shall not, save for cause, be displaced by the provisions of this act.

In this connection allow me to say that in other cities where they have a well regulated system of education, we find that that office is an absolute necessity. So far as my own city, which I have the honor to represent in part, is concerned we find a superintendent of buildings and supplies, who is regarded as a most important officer. We have saved hundreds of thousands of dollars by having at the head of such a department a thoroughly competent architect or engineer; I therefore trust that this committee and the Committee on the District of Columbia having charge of this matter will take it up and see that something is done in the future. I simply desire to call attention to it at this time so that the committee can not claim that it has not been informed of so important and necessary position as that of superintendent of buildings and supplies. Mr. Chairman, I now withdraw the pro forma amendment.

For extending the telephone system to one 16-room building in the "first division," one 12-room building in the "eighth division," including the cost of the necessary wire, cable, poles, cross arms, braces, conduit connections, extra labor, and other necessary items to be expended under the electrical department, $600.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word with a view of getting some information from the gentleman in charge of the bill. We have now nearly finished the provision which provides for the expenses of the public schools in this District. No one surely desires there should be any undue economy in reference to the education of the young here or elsewhere, but, on the other hand, Mr. Chairman, I am sure no one, and certainly not the members of this committee, desire that there should be any undue expenditure in proportion to the benefits which are to be realized. I am led to make these remarks because I received this morning the tax levy of the city of Rochester, in which city I live. That city, I will assume, is no better run nor worse run than any other well-managed American city, and for the coming year the appropriations for schools for all purposes are $800,000. The city of Washington is larger. There are certain conditions which probably render a larger scale of expenditures necessary here than in some other cities; but, Mr. Chairman, if we obtain the same services in Rochester that we do in Washington——

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. How many pupils have you in Rochester?

Mr. PERKINS. There are about 200,000 people——

Mr. MADDEN. But I asked how many pupils.

Mr. PERKINS. The number that would usually go with 200,000 population I can not state; but I know the schools are fully attended in that city in proportion to the population. Now, I see in the bill which we have now to pass the entire appropriations for schools for the District of Columbia are nearly $2,500,000, which is three times the amount that is raised in the city of Rochester. It ought not to be over twice as much.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for one other question?

Mr. PERKINS. Assuredly.

Mr. MADDEN. How many teachers are there?

Mr. PERKINS. I can not give the number. I can only say that we have a school system for a population of 200,000, and then, I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois, that the expenses of this city are three times as much, and the results are much the same. If there is here a superior school system, if better results are obtained, that would justify, that would account for a larger proportion of expense; but I say, after some observation, without any fear of contradiction from any member of this committee, that the school system of Rochester is fully equal to that of Washington—I would not go too far if I said it was superior—but surely it is fully equal, and is, indeed, a complete system of education, beginning with kindergartens and going through to the high schools that fit one for entrance to any university, and equal to any system which we find in this city.

Now, money is properly spent here, and should be properly spent in reference to furnishing not only education, but health to the young. There are equal facilities furnished in Rochester. I think the best test is to take the death rate, as that fairly represents the average health of the community, young and old alike, and the death rate in Rochester is lower than in Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. May I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended for five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the minimum salary paid to the teachers in Rochester?

Mr. PERKINS. I must say to the gentleman from New York that I can not furnish the details of the budget of the schools in Rochester.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How is it possible to make comparisons if the gentleman can not tell the number of pupils, the minimum salaries, or any of the other details?

Mr. PERKINS. It is perfectly possible to make the comparison. The best comparison possible is made by taking the average population of a city, and the expenses should be, other things being equal, in proportion to the population if similar results are obtained. My friend will certainly not question that statement. It may be, and it doubtless is the fact, that the school system of Rochester is more economically conducted than the school system of Washington all along the line.

Mr. FITZGERALD. May it not also be a fact that the teachers of the schools in Rochester are grossly underpaid, and that that accounts for the small amount appropriated for schools?

Mr. PERKINS. I should hardly think that the case because of the results. If any city systematically underpays its employees the difference will be shown in the results. Where you have for twenty-five years a constantly improving school system, satisfactory to the entire community, satisfactory in its results, then surely it can not be said that in that system there is any defect that impairs the work to be done.

The same thing applies to the entire expenses of the city of Rochester, since we are on comparisons, and which are about $3,000,000. They are three times as large in this city. The same difference that appears in the school budget appears in the entire budget, and I venture to say when we take the results in lighting, in government, in order, and in health, there is no such difference between the condition of Washington and the condition of Rochester as should make the expense of this city larger, after allowing for the difference in population. I have called these figures to the attention of the committee not with any desire of complaining of the Appropriation Committee, but certainly they are significant and notable, and it does seem to suggest the question as to whether it would not be possible, not in any way to lessen efficient service, but to obtain the same results in this city with a less pro rata cost.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York what he thinks would be a reasonable per capita cost per pupil per annum?

Mr. PERKINS. In answer to that I can only say—and I base my opinion not upon scientific knowledge, but upon experience—that in the city of Rochester, where there is a thoroughly satisfactory system and facilities for every child that wishes to be educated, it costs $4 per head of the population. A population of 200,000 people pays $800,000 for their school system. In Washington it costs about $8 per head.

Mr. MADDEN. I mean the per capita cost per pupil. I do not mean the people. I mean how much per pupil?

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman tell me what, in the city of Chicago, is the percentage of the entire population that attend the schools?

Mr. MADDEN. We have about 2,000,000 people and there is an average attendance of 250,000 pupils.

Mr. PERKINS. My recollection would be that the average attendance in Rochester would be nearly 30,000. It may not be more than in Chicago—12½ per cent.

Mr. MADDEN. That would make it about $25, according to your figures?

Mr. PERKINS. No. If there were 30,000 pupils and the entire expense was $800,000, it would make it about $27 per pupil.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman knows that the larger the town is the more it costs, because the more facilities you have to have the more you have to pay for property.

Mr. PERKINS. I do not see why there should be an increase, as the proportionate expense, as my friend knows, of a great corporation is less than a small corporation.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I would like the indulgence of the committee for a moment at this point. I am very glad that the gentleman from New York has called attention to this matter. The committee will perhaps be criticised at this point more than any other one in framing the bill in reducing the cost the coming year below the estimate. This fact ought to be borne in mind—no gentleman has raised the point, that I remember, but it adds materially to the total expense—and that is that we have a duplicate school system here in everything but superintendents on account of the large colored population; and that adds much to the expense year by year, and will continue to do so as long as the races are separate, and that probably is for all time; certainly for our time.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let me suggest one thing to the gentleman, on the criterion suggested by the gentleman from New York: The State of Massachusetts expends over $5.50 per capita for educational purposes, and that is more than twice the average expenses per capita for educational purposes in the balance of the Union taken together. Does that argue extravagance in the administration of the public schools in Massachusetts? In some States the expenditure is less than 80 cents per capita of population. In Massachusetts it is $5.50, which is more than twice the average paid for education purposes in any State.

Mr. MADDEN. In the city of Chicago $2,500,000 per annum is expended on the public school system. If we assume that Chicago has a population of 2,000,000 that would make $6.25 per capita. So that Chicago is spending more per capita than Massachusetts on the schools, where the average cost per capita runs to about $5.50.

Mr. PERKINS. What does the gentleman regard as the present population of Washington?

Mr. MADDEN. Three hundred and twenty thousand.

Mr. PERKINS. And the amount paid for schools is $2,400,000, which is very nearly $8 per capita, while under the well-managed school system of Massachusetts it is only $5.50.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It all goes to show that the expenditure per capita is not always a reliable criterion in determining whether there is a proper and efficient administration of the public schools.

The Clerk read as follows:

All school buildings authorized hereunder, and all school buildings constructed or being constructed in the District of Columbia shall have all exits with doors opening outward, and the necessary alteration of exits in buildings not now so constructed shall be made within thirty days after the passage of this act; all exits in said buildings shall be unlocked and otherwise unfastened each school day from one-half hour before until one-half hour after school hours; janitors violating the foregoing provision shall be summarily removed from employment.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. KEIFER. Let me offer an amendment to the whole paragraph.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to having the gentleman have his amendment read for information, but I think it is a very poor provision to put into the law.

Mr. KEIFER. It is a most important item to go into the law; but it is subject to the point of order, if the gentleman is going to insist upon it.

Mr. MANN. I think I shall. It is more a matter of regulation that ought not to be done by Congress. It ought to be done by a school board.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman reserves his point of order I desire to say a word or two about the matter.

Mr. MANN. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. It is said that this ought to be done by some general legislation.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Or regulation.

Mr. KEIFER. Or regulation. It is done in a sense by regulation, but this amounts to nothing effective. Two of the greatest calamities in modern times have arisen under the provisions of law or regulations that ought to have been and seemed to be quite sufficient. The most recent and most startling—no, not more startling than the other one—has occurred in the city of Cleveland, in the State of Ohio, where there has been a law for forty years, stronger in its provisions than the one proposed to be put in here. But it was a law like this clause here, if it is enacted, and it is to that I wanted to make an amendment, making it effective. It was a law that required exit doors to public buildings to open outward. I understand the same situation applies to the city of Chicago, where by regulation or of law exit doors to theaters or other public buildings were required to open outward. Now, what happened in both the city of Chicago at the time of the burning of the Iroquois Theater, and the recent fire which took the lives of 150 or more innocent children in the city of Cleveland? There was a law in Ohio, as I recollect, that required exit doors to open outward. The difficulty, Mr. Chairman, was that the law did not require all doors that were used for entrance and exit to these buildings to open automatically outward, but left it to somebody to say, "This door is an exit door" and "This door is not." So that when the fire started in each of the cases, the occupants rushed to a door that was not called an "exit door," and as they could not pass out, they struggled and were burned to death for want of an exit.

Another objection to these laws is that they have been directory in the past to the extent of saying that certain things should be done, but nobody was held responsible if they were not done. The provision that the point of order is made against is subject to that objection. The provision that I desire to have put in this bill puts a penalty upon those whose business it is to control these buildings, and to require all exit and entrance doors that can be used or are used for the admission or exit of children to open automatically outward, so that it will be impossible for such an accident to happen in one of the schools here, if the law is complied with, as happened in the city of Cleveland only a month ago. I should be glad if we could have general legislation and general regulations about these matters, but I think that here is presented one of those extraordinary things that we should legislate about, and most drastically, when we are appropriating for schools. We are interested in educating the minds of these children and we should be peculiarly interested in preserving their lives. I should like to have my amendment read to show how I would amend the bill if the point of order is not insisted upon.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Before the amendment is read I should like to suggest this to him, and I want the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to hear it, that in the adoption of a regulation there can be no adequate penalty.

Mr. KEIFER. That is the trouble.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And there ought to be a penalty upon those who administer the school laws and superintend the construction of school buildings; an adequate penalty, so that the buildings shall be constructed and equipped in such a way that the facilities for escape in times of exigency shall be ample to avoid such awful tragedies as that which occurred recently at Cleveland.

Mr. KEIFER. Now, I should like to have the Clerk read my proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out paragraph on lines 7 to 16, inclusive, page 55, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"All school buildings authorized hereunder and all school buildings constructed or being constructed in the District of Columbia shall hereafter have all doors which are, may, or can be used for entrance or exits thereto, or for entrance or exits to any and all rooms therein which are, may, or can be used or occupied by school children as school rooms, so constructed as to open automatically outward; and the necessary alteration of all school buildings now ready for or in use in the District of Columbia not now constructed in conformity with this paragraph shall be made to conform thereto within thirty days after the passage of this act, and any violation of this provision by any person having the control or the right to control any school building in the District of Columbia shall be deemed to be a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof in a court of competent jurisdiction shall be fined in the sum of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both fine and imprisonment. All exits in said buildings shall be unlocked and otherwise unfastened each school day from one-half hour before until one-half hour after school hours, and janitors violating this provision shall be summarily removed from employment."

Mr. MANN. I understand this amendment is only read for information.

Mr. KEIFER. That is all true. I should have no right to have it read otherwise; but I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That amendment would permit the use of turnstile doors, would it not, in school buildings?

Mr. KEIFER. It refers to doors that open automatically outward. I do not think that would include turnstile doors.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There ought not to be any "do not think" about it. It ought to be absolute.

Mr. KEIFER. We use them here in the Capitol temporarily, but I agree with the gentleman that they ought not to be used in school buildings.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Attention was drawn to this the other day in an editorial which I saw in a New York paper, suggesting that in the event of a panic in a building containing a large number of people the turnstile door, strongly constructed, would amount to a perfect death trap.

Mr. KEIFER. I think that is true. My provision would not apply to a turnstile door at all.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It would not prohibit a turnstile door.

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; I think my amendment would.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he is going to insist on his point of order?

Mr. MANN. I think I shall.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then there is no sense in debating it.

Mr. MANN. I want to say just one word. I believe the school board of the District of Columbia is the only governmental function in the District consisting exclusively of residents of the District. They have the authority to make such regulations as they please in reference to these buildings, and if anyone is interested, they ought to be. In addition to that the Committee on the District of Columbia is the only committee of this House which regularly, every two weeks, has a day set apart for its exclusive benefit, for the consideration of bills reported from that committee. So that on the one hand, without this provision in the law, we have the school board, composed of residents of the District, with full authority to protect the lives of their own children, and on the other hand we have a legislative committee with a right to have a bill covering the subject considered in the House as privileged matter. I do not know what an automatic door is, such as the gentleman from Ohio proposes to have provided.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman allow me to show him one? He can see it in operation at the entrance at the right of the Speaker's desk.

Mr. MANN. If that is all there is to an automatic door opening outward, that is a door which is not automatic and opens both ways, and certainly could not be used for the outside door of a school building. For these reasons I feel constrained——

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I hope the gentleman will withhold the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not insist on the point of order. The committee considered this with a good deal of care, and after the statement was made in the committee to this effect——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Why did the gentleman's committee, having no legislative jurisdiction over the subject, "consider the matter with a great deal of care," when we have a committee appointed for the special purpose of considering legislation relating to the District?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I will tell the gentleman. In the course of the investigation by that committee we visited one of the schools of the District. In connection with that school is a dormitory, a hospital, a dining room, a bathroom, all in one building, in which at times there are a large number of boys and girls. Going down where these children have gone year after year for a long time, I noticed, and called the attention of my colleagues to it, that the footstone on which the door closed was worn fully one-half in two by the tread of the children's feet. The other half had apparently never been stepped on, as far as the wear was concerned. Upon trying to open the door, we could not do it; it was not only fast that day, but had been fast for many years. In case of fire and a panic in that building, there would have been, or, at least, might have been, precisely what occurred on a larger scale in the city of Cleveland. It had been overlooked year after year. It might never have happened and it might happen within forty-eight hours.

Now, with these things in mind, with the public attention aroused and parents in earnest about the safety of their children and asking that we look after their children's protection, we thought it no more than our duty to throw around them at this time an emergency measure, if you please, to provide against the possibilities of accidents such as shocked the whole country in these recent weeks. This is all there is of it, and I hope the gentleman will not insist on his point of order. It can do no harm, and it may result in great good. There is no regulation now for it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to add my supplication to what the gentleman from Michigan has said.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order. It has no business in this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

Insert as a new paragraph, after line 6, page 55, the following:
"No part of any appropriation herein provided for the construction or maintenance shall be used unless all school buildings authorized hereunder, and all school buildings constructed or being constructed in the District of Columbia shall have all exits with doors opening outward, and the necessary alteration of exits in buildings not now so constructed shall be made within thirty days after the passage of this act."

Mr. MANN. I make a point of order on that amendment. This is not confined as a limitation on the appropriation at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I have used precisely the same language that was used in the paragraph that has just gone out on the point of order, but I have introduced the paragraph by providing that no part of the appropriation for the construction and maintenance of the school building shall be used unless these things are done.

Mr. MANN. Unless the law is changed.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. In other words, it is a limitation on the use of the money. There is no law on the subject.

Mr. MANN. Then it is a change of law.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It states certain things that shall be done.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, if the gentleman's amendment referred only to the construction of new schoolhouses, it might be in order; but so far as the amendment is made to the existing paragraph, it certainly is not a limitation, and therefore is subject to the point of order.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a separate paragraph, after line 6, page 55, the following:
"School buildings authorized and appropriated for herein shall be constructed with all doors intended to be used as exits and entrances opening outwards."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to that amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following words to the amendment: "And if feasible, each of said buildings shall have at least four exits."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we ought to have as many exits in the buildings used for school purposes as possible, commensurate with the size of the building and the persons accommodated. My observation is that the real difficulty is in people trying to get out of one exit or on one side of the building. We want to do everything possible to prevent the horrors that have shocked the people of this country in the last year, and if it is feasible to have exits on each side of the building we ought to have them. It is well enough to have the doors opening outward, but if the people or children all rush to one side you will, even if the doors open outward, have the calamities duplicated.

My observation has been that the trouble has not been so much from the fire as it has been from the panic and the people trampling one over another. This is especially true in these school buildings, where there are small children and larger children. If a small child falls down the others trample it, one after the other. But whether that is true or not, if it is feasible to have four exits in these school buildings, they will furnish the greater opportunity for the children to get outside and escape the danger. Instead of having to rush to one exit they may divide and try to escape at several, thereby relieving each one from congestion.

Mr. MANN. Suppose there are places in the District where they may put up a small school building. Does the gentleman propose to have four exits, all with doors unlocked during the entire time school is in session, and for half an hour before and after, as has been suggested; and if so, will the gentleman propose to have four policemen to guard the doors to see that nobody steals anything inside?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think any reason for that exists. I do not know just how large the schoolhouses are here, but my observation has been that they are pretty good-sized buildings.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman is now talking about the schools in the city of Washington. This applies to the whole District.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am referring more particularly to the school buildings in the city of Washington.

Mr. MANN. Did the gentleman himself go to a country school?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MANN. How many exits did it have?

Mr. JONES of Washington. One. We had windows that we could get out of on each side and jump to the ground without any danger.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman have all the schoolhouses in the country changed and an exit put at each end and on the sides?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not ask that this shall apply to the country schoolhouses.

Mr. MANN. But that is what it does apply to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It would not do much harm there. If we can preserve the lives of those children, we ought to have them, and I would put in there "feasible in all buildings in the city of Washington."

Mr. MANN. I did not make the point of order on the gentleman's amendment, although it was subject to the point of order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will leave the amendment as it is. It can be fixed up when it gets to the Senate. This matter ought to be attended to in some way. Many of the churches and school buildings in this city are nothing but death traps. Regulations requiring more exits should be applied to all places of public gathering, and nowhere so much as in our schoolhouses. If the amendment needs modification so as to apply to the city, this can be done and should be done in the Senate.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I would like to have the amendment to the amendment reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk again reported the amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Washington to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "act," in line 12, page 55, insert:
"No turnstile door shall be constructed or used in any school building in said District."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order. That paragraph has already gone out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that that paragraph has gone out.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a new paragraph following the one just adopted, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the amendment just adopted the following:
"No part of any appropriation carried in this bill shall be used for the maintenance of schools in any building unless all outside doors thereto shall open outward and be kept unlocked every school day for one-half hour before and until one-half hour after school hours."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I sent to the Clerk's desk a moment ago as a separate paragraph to go at the end of the amendment just adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new paragraph the following:
"No turnstile door shall be constructed or used in any school building in said District."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that, but I will reserve it if the gentleman wishes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I am led to offer this amendment because of a forceful editorial which I read in a New York daily the other day, suggesting that in the event of a panic in a crowded school building containing turnstile doors such doors would amount practically to death traps.

They all "open outward," they are "unlocked," and therefore they would not, under the bill as it now stands, come within the provisions of the law. In other words, they may lawfully be put in a school building in this District. The bare fact that probably they will not be so put ought not to prevent us from making the provision mandatory that they shall not be put in any school building. I can not conceive of anything much worse than would be one of the ordinary revolving doors with two or three hundred frightened children trying to get out of it during a fire. It would be blocked and many would be burned or smothered to death of course. Such doors "open outward," they are "unlocked," but they are unsafe in a schoolhouse. It ought not to be left to the discretion of the school board to put them in or leave them out, but a provision should be inserted in the law prohibiting under severe penalty the use of turnstile doors in any school building in this District.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt the turnstile door to which the gentleman refers saves hundreds of thousands of lives every year by the prevention of tuberculosis, pneumonia, and other diseases that come from taking cold. I am not willing to see them abolished in the Capitol or elsewhere where they may be properly used, and therefore I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Miscellaneous: For rent of substation and stable at Anacostia, $480;
For fuel, $4,000;
For repairs to stations, $4,750;
For miscellaneous and contingent expenses, including the purchase of new wagons, rewards for fugitives, modern revolvers, maintenance of card system, stationery, city directories, and periodicals, telegraphing, telephoning, photographs, printing, binding, gas, ice, washing, meals for prisoners, furniture and repairs thereto, beds and bedclothing, insignia of office, purchase and care of horses, horse and vehicle for superintendent, bicycles, police equipments and repairs to the same, harness, forage, repairs to vehicles, van, and patrol wagons, saddles, and expenses incurred in the prevention and detection of crime, repairs to rented buildings, and other necessary expenses, $33,000; of which amount a sum not exceeding $500 may be expended by the major and superintendent of police for the prevention and detection of crime under his certificates approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and every such certificate shall be deemed a sufficient voucher for the sum therein expressed to have been expended: Provided, That the War Department may furnish the District Commissioners for the use of the police, upon requisition, such unserviceable mounted equipment as may be repaired;

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What is "unserviceable mounted equipment?" Why do District police officers use unserviceable equipment?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Sometimes the War Department changes the type of saddles, the same as they change the type of uniforms or of arms for their soldiers, and they become unserviceable in the War Department, and may be and have been very serviceable to the mounted policemen of the District.

Mr. MANN. I thought maybe they turned over their second-hand stuff which they had worn out on these long riding expeditions to the mounted police of the District.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It is simply a matter of economy to the District, and no harm to the General Government.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEALTH DEPARTMENT.

For health officer, $3,500; chief clerk and deputy health officer, $2,200; clerk, $1,400; four clerks, two of whom may act as sanitary and food inspectors, at $1,200 each; two clerks, at $1,000 each; clerk, $600; chief inspector and deputy health officer, $1,800; fifteen sanitary and food inspectors, at $1,200 each; one inspector, $1,000; one inspector $900; sanitary and food inspector, who shall be a veterinary surgeon and act as inspector of live stock and dairy farms, $1,200; five sanitary and food inspectors, who shall be veterinary surgeons, at $1,000 each, and five sanitary and food inspectors, at $900 each, to assist in the enforcement of the milk and pure food laws and the regulations relating thereto; sanitary and food inspector, who shall inspect dairy products and shall be a practical chemist, $1,800; messenger and janitor, $600; driver, $540; poundmaster, $1,500; and for laborers, at not exceeding $40 per month, $2,400; in all, $53,740.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It occurs to me that this is an enormous expense in connection with this department, and I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if this bill makes provision for additional help to what has heretofore been employed? Are the employees mentioned in this bill the same as have heretofore been carried in the appropriation bill? I notice this bill provides here for deputy health officer and health officer and a number of clerks, and then, a little farther down, it provides for an inspector, who is also a deputy health officer, and I should like to know whether there has been an increase in the number of men employed in this department or whether these positions specified in this bill have been heretofore carried in this appropriation?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I will say that there have been two additional inspectors relating to milk inspection provided for, and, in line with the gentleman's thought, the appropriation is only about 60 per cent of what was asked for, but it carries as much as it did last year, plus the salaries of these two additional inspectors.

Mr. ADAIR. In other words, there are just two additional inspectors carried in this bill?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For special services in connection with the detection of the adulteration of drugs and of foods, including candy and milk, $100.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman in charge of this bill a question. Beginning with line 17, page 65, "For special services in connection with the detection of the adulteration of drugs and of foods;" what does that refer to, "special services?" The appropriation is small, but I do not understand it.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The object of that is that certain parties may be sent out; for instance, there is a doubt about whether a confection sold at some place is what it represents itself to be, and this appropriation enables them to give a man a dollar or half a dollar, as the case may be, to go out and get a sample or samples of that confection in order to inspect it.

Mr. COX of Indiana. To make a special test?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That is the point.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses incident to the enforcement of an act to regulate the sale of milk in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, approved March 2, 1895; an act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes, approved June 30, 1906, $1,000.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do so for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Michigan, in charge of the bill, whether he regards that as a sufficient amount in order to bring about a correct examination and investigation of these very important subjects, viz, to regulate the sale of milk and of the sale or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and so forth. It seems to me to be a very small amount, and I ask the question merely for information.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. They are here, as are nearly all the recommendations of the committee, below the estimates, but they are equal to the estimates of all previous years, save one, namely, 1893, and have met apparently the necessities of the case up to this time.

Mr. GOULDEN. Can the gentleman tell us just how much below the estimates the figures carried in this item are?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The estimate this year were $3,000 and the appropriation $1,000. The estimates in all preceding years were $1,000, save one year, several years ago, when they were $1,500.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does the gentleman, who is a man of large experience and good judgment, think $1,000 is sufficient to secure a proper and efficient inspection and investigation of these matters?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I would hardly want to give my judgment alone, but it is the judgment of the committee having the matter in charge; they were unanimous in their report.

Mr. GOULDEN. That is all I wish to know.

The Clerk read as follows:

Juvenile court: For judge, $3,000; clerk, $2,000; chief probation officer, $1,500; probation officer, $1,200; janitor, $540; in all, $8,240.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 2, on page 67, after the word "thousand," insert the words "six hundred," so as to read:
"Juvenile court: For judge, $3,600."

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I make a point of order on that.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Surely.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, the judge of the juvenile court, which is a police court, is certainly entitled to recognition the same as is proposed to be given to the police-court judges in the sections following this one. The reason advanced for this proposed increase, Mr. Chairman, is that the services and the demands upon the judge here in his supervision of the children on probation make the increase asked for only equitable. The salary provided for the judges of the juvenile courts of Colorado is $4,000, that of Brooklyn $6,000, New York City $9,000, Chicago $10,000. Doctor Hastings says of the judge of the Chicago juvenile court that he is a jurist of the highest standing, receiving a salary of $10,000, and it is recognized that no man is too wise or too eminent to deal with children's cases. This is equally true of the gentleman now sitting in the District juvenile court.

Mr. ADAIR. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. GOULDEN. Certainly.

Mr. ADAIR. Are you taking into consideration the fact that these are Chicago children?

Mr. GOULDEN. Yes; I will say that I am. In answer to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR], I believe that Chicago children are no worse or no better than the children of Washington or other cities.

Mr. BOWERS. Why was not this suggestion or an application for an increase in the salary of this office submitted in the usual way to the Committee on Appropriations, in order that they might make some investigation?

Mr. GOULDEN. I am unable to answer the question of the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, but I do submit this: That if you propose, as the committee does in this bill, to increase the salaries of the police judges—and I think they are entitled to it—I have no fault to find whatever. However, if you are going to give it to those gentlemen, you have a right to give it to one who is doing equally as much work. And in this connection I desire to say that I have visited the juvenile court and witnessed the work done by the very able and zealous gentleman who now presides over that court. And if the members of this committee could see the work as I have seen it, the admirable manner in which he presides over the court and the many cases decided and the great good accomplished to society, there would be no question whatever, Mr. Chairman, in granting him this increase.

Mr. BOWERS. Does the gentleman press that increase on the Committee of the Whole without any opportunity at all on the part of the Appropriations Committee to inquire into the matter? I see the gentleman holds in his hand a paper, a copy of which other gentlemen received—I know I had one, as I recall, two days ago—long after this bill was reported to the House, and the inquiry I want to press is the one I made a moment ago, if he expects to insist on the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union taking up this material increase without any opportunity of having it considered by the Committee on Appropriations and hearings had on it?

Mr. GOULDEN. I was not aware of the fact that the committee had not considered it. I assumed that a committee composed of intelligent members as this great committee is, had considered all question of this character fully.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman know that the salary of the judge to whom he has referred is fixed by law at $3,000?

Mr. BURLESON. And fixed only two years ago.

Mr. MADDEN. That is the fact, and the salary of the police court judges to whom he has referred are fixed at $4,000; but as a matter of fact the Committee on Appropriations has been appropriating less than that. That is one instance where the appropriation is less than the statute provides.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the distinguished gentleman tell me why?

Mr. MADDEN. Because they did not think the service was worth as much as the statute fixed.

Mr. GOULDEN. A closing word. I simply want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that I believe the gentleman presiding over the juvenile court is entitled to exactly the same consideration that the police-court judges are to receive; and they are all worthy of the sum which is to be given them. They should be given that as an act of justice.

Mr. ADAIR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GOULDEN. Certainly.

Mr. ADAIR. That is whether or not he has any information that leads him to believe that the judge of the juvenile court would probably tender his resignation if his salary was not increased, and whether he thinks it would not be possible to procure a gentleman who would gladly take his position who would be equally suitable for this place?

Mr. GOULDEN. In answer I would state that in the first place, I had no conference with the gentleman on either subject. In the second place, I do not believe that you could duplicate the gentleman who fills that position in the city of Washington on that salary or find a better informed in the law or one more eminently fitted to discharge the important duties, than the judge now occupying that position.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the gentleman from New York will withdraw his proposed amendment for the following reasons: In the first place, as has been stated, this court is just getting fairly established; in the second place, there is an orderly way by which to get at these changes. There was nothing brought before the committee in the extended hearings we had.

Mr. GOULDEN. I hope the gentleman is not insinuating that I am doing anything in a disorderly way. I only desire the gentleman's definition of the word.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. There was no application for an increase of the salary of this judge, as I recall; otherwise we would have been glad to have investigated it, and reported upon that if we thought a change was necessary. Now, another year is coming, when this can be brought up and considered and reported on as other proposed changes are reported on.

Then, again, while I am on my feet, the gentleman speaks of this being on all fours with the police court. The police court has been in existence here for forty years or more. One of these men has been serving for many years, another a less time. The net receipts of their court turned back to the Government were more than $60,000 last year. They sit every day in the week, Sunday alone excepted, and on every holiday. And I will also state, while I am on my feet, that these judges have had long service, which the committee thought worthy of recognition.

Mr. GOULDEN. I believe that the police-court judges are entitled not only to what you recommend, but what the law gives them—$4,000. I wish to be clearly understood upon this subject—that I am not opposed to granting that increase to the police court judges, but am heartily in favor of it.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I do not want to insist upon the point of order, but I will state to the gentleman if he will not withdraw it, I shall have to so insist.

Mr. GOULDEN. My colleague from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] wishes to be heard, and after that I will consider the question of withdrawing it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, if there be any official in the District of Columbia whose compensation should be increased, in my judgment it is the man who presides over the children's court. Those who have given any attention to the great work done by children's courts realize that it requires a man of exceptional tact and information to properly discharge the duties of the office. Prior to the establishment of the children's courts it had been the practice to bring small children charged with petty offenses—offenses for which they should not, in my judgment, in many instances be brought before magistrates—into courts where were brought the hardened and habitual criminals. The association of young children with these hardened habitual criminals was very disastrous to the children. Under the new system there is now provided a court to which are brought children charged with all kinds of offenses. It is not the purpose of the court to endeavor to mete out punishment in strict conformity with the law so much as it is to exercise an influence that will not be exercised by the police court magistrate over the criminal—a refining, elevating influence, that will tend to prevent the child having any association at all with the criminal. I am personally acquainted with the gentleman who fills this office. He is a refined, cultured, well-educated gentleman, as well as a good lawyer.

He devotes as much time to the discharge of the duties of his place as do the police-court magistrates. In my judgment, he devotes more time. He does not discharge the duties of his office in a purely perfunctory and routine manner, such as is customary in some police courts, but every case that is brought before him is considered carefully and intelligently, and an effort is made to ascertain the facts surrounding the child brought before him and to have those civilizing influences that are now extended by charitably disposed people reach out so as to better the condition of the child in his home. This man should not only be placed in a position where he can keep himself decently, in conformity with the requirements of the position, but this court should be placed upon a plane that will make those appearing before it feel that it is not inferior to the police courts. In my judgment, it is of more importance to the welfare of the people of the community in the work that it does than the police courts, and if my colleague is disposed to permit any increases of salary to be made upon this bill, I sincerely trust that he will not make it impossible to have this increase in this salary, particularly since the committee, on investigation, has found it advisable to recommend an increase in the salary of the police-court judges.

There is not much that can be said in addition to what has been stated already regarding the place. I trust that the importance of this court will not be minimized in the estimation either of the public or of those who unfortunately are compelled to have business there by making it appear that this judge occupies a position inferior to the police-court judges of this community.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on the point of order?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I regret exceedingly, Mr. Chairman, while agreeing in the main with what has been said, that I feel constrained to insist on the point of order, believing that we can rectify anything along this line in the future.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent, $240.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of inquiring of the gentleman in charge of the bill what this rent is for.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. For the building that is used for this court.

Mr. WILLIAMS. For the juvenile court?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. For the juvenile court.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is there no building belonging to the District of Columbia where this court might hold its sessions?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Not at this time. There was a room provided in the new police-court building for the juvenile court, but it was thought upon further reflection not advisable to hold both courts under one roof, because of the association with the children.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Association of the children with older criminals?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That is it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And there is no other place in the District, in a building belonging to the District, where this court could be held?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Not that I am advised of; no.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It seems to me it is a little unnecessary for us to be paying so much rent for the District. We have spent a great deal of money for a great building, and we have the old building, and I hope the rents will cease after a while, at any rate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Writs of lunacy: To defray the expenses attending the execution of writs de lunatico inquirendo and commitments thereunder in all cases of indigent insane persons committed or sought to be committed to the Government Hospital for the Insane by order of the executive authority of the District of Columbia under the provisions of existing law, $2,500.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the bill for some information in regard to this paragraph. It seems to appropriate $2,500 for expenses attending the execution of these writs. I desire to ask whether that includes any provision for attorney or counsel fees.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I understand it does not.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Who, if anybody, looks after the interests of the District of Columbia in these proceedings? Is there any counsel, learned in the law, who attends to the matters relating to writs of lunatico inquirendo in the interests of the District of Columbia?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The corporation counsel.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Is that part of his duty?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Part of his duty as the law officer of the District.

Mr. BRODHEAD. How many writs were issued last year, or how many cases are there of indigent insane, on an average, per annum?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I do not recollect that the matter of the number of writs was gone into particularly. The number of insane is easily obtainable, because we pay the asylum on a basis of numbers. It is a contract matter.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I read this bill yesterday and I came across this paragraph.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I am told there is in the neighborhood of a thousand from the District, but how many committed within the last twelve months we do not know.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I took pains myself to inquire at the office of the corporation counsel to ascertain who looked after the interest of the District of Columbia in these matters, and I was informed by that office that neither of the assistant counsel at present in the office of the corporation counsel looked after it. They said that no one of the four assistants had time to do so, and this astounding piece of information was given to me that the interest of the District of Columbia in all of these matters was looked after by the stenographer of that office; that he attended to it.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The stenographer of what office?

Mr. BRODHEAD. In the office of the corporation counsel; he happens to be a member of the bar.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. He is a lawyer?

Mr. BRODHEAD. Yes; but his office is that of stenographer, but his time is given up to a great extent in looking after these matters. It seemed to me that it was a matter of great importance to the District, because the District is very much interested in the matter. Unless it is properly looked after from the point of the District, it would seem to me possible for the surrounding country to dump their indigent insane into the District for the purpose of being taken care of, or it might be possible for an insane person to be committed as indigent insane who, in point of fact, is not indigent. In such a case as that the District of Columbia would suffer.

It therefore occurs to me that it would be proper to designate somebody to look after that business in the interest of the District of Columbia. I have a formal amendment which, if the gentleman agrees with me in the general line, would perhaps meet the emergency, and I will send it to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 69, line 7, by striking out the period after the word "dollars" and insert a comma; and following the comma insert "and the further sum of $1,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the corporation counsel for the employment of counsel to conduct, in the interest of the District of Columbia, all the proceedings incident to such writs of lunatico inquirendo."

Mr. MANN. To that I reserve a point of order.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I ascertained that last year there were 365 cases of indigent insane looked after by the stenographer of the corporation counsel's office. Ordinarily an attorney's fee of $5 in each case like that would be a very modest sum, and that would make $1,825.

Now, the situation, as I understand it, is that there is nobody in the office of the corporation counsel whose duty it is to look after this matter except the stenographer; that is, it is not looked after by any one of the regular assistants. The District of Columbia is directly interested in the matter, not only to see that there is no person committed too hastily and no injustice done to the individual, but that there is no injustice done to the District by imposing upon the District the support and maintenance of persons committed as indigent insane who come here from the surrounding country for that very purpose. Now, fortunately, the stenographer in question is versatile. I ascertained that he took upon himself to examine into two or three cases where the indigent person was, in point of fact, not indigent, and that the office recovered in one case the sum of $1,000. Had it not been looked after, had it not been discovered by the stenographers, it would have been lost completely. Probably that office will not always have such an efficient stenographer, as it is no part of his duty or qualification to be a member of the bar.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman think that there might be more danger of putting more people in the asylum if you have more officers to deal with?

Mr. BRODHEAD. No; we must go upon the assumption that everything is carried out in good faith.

Mr. MADDEN. The proposition of the gentleman is to create another position.

Mr. BRODHEAD. My proposition is that the matter is of sufficient importance to have some one look after it.

Mr. MADDEN. There are plenty of people to look after it.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Just one word more, Mr. Chairman. I looked over the hearings of the committee, and, as I recall it, the office of the corporation counsel did ask for an additional assistant, and that such additional help to that office was recommended by the Commissioners.

I do not recall that this particular point that I am now asking about was raised before the committee or whether or not this committee ever considered this point, to wit, that there is nobody whose particular and special duty it is to look after the interests of the District of Columbia in the matters of the commitment of the indigent insane.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman I want to say, first, that the question of commitment of insane is still under the direction of the corporation counsel. He may delegate it to a lawyer who is a stenographer. That is his business. It is not for us to criticise his administration, but it is his duty to see that the commitments are properly made. I think on that there can be no dispute.

Mr. MADDEN. And as a matter of fact, it would follow that any recommendation of any assistant of corporation counsel would not be final until acted upon and approved by the corporation counsel.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That is also true. If the work is not properly looked after, the corporation counsel is at fault. Now, again, for fear there may be impositions upon the District—and undoubtedly there are, not confined to Washington, but it is everywhere in the United States, the people desire to unload their undesirable citizens, if I may use that modern phrase, upon somebody else——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman reserves a point of order?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The gentleman from Illinois reserves a point of order. I am not raising a point of order. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not insist on his amendment after he hears me. The District has located at the asylum some one who is charged with the duty of guarding the interests of the District by discovering any who may not be insane or who may have been committed in the name of the District and who do not belong there, and I may say that deportations out of the District are occurring constantly. We provide a fund in the bill to pay for expenses of just such cases as that. Then, again, the corporation counsel did not ask, nor did the Commissioners, for this officer. The fact that they asked for additional funds is something that is duplicated in almost every Government Department, but they did not set out that it was necessary at this time to have additional counsel or to add to the number already in the corporation counsel's office. So that the committee having investigated and reported as they did, I do not feel that the gentleman's reasons as alleged have been sufficient to warrant the incorporation of his amendment, and I hope he will withdraw it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not see how it can possibly be that the trial of indigent insane in the District could occupy more than one day in two weeks. I know something from observation of the trial of insane people, and I think that the stenographer of the corporation counsel's office, if he has been admitted to the bar and knows anything about law at all, is the very person to represent the District in these matters. Mr. Chairman, the amendment contemplates the creation of a new office not authorized by law, not now provided for, and it seems to me it is subject to the point of order. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. Chairman, just one word. I move to strike out the last word. I think it is only proper for me to say that this amendment was entirely original with me and not at any suggestion directly or indirectly from the corporation counsel's office. The corporation counsel did not ask me to do this, but it occurred to me in looking on page 8, I think it is, where the appropriation is made for the salary of the corporation counsel's office, that the sum appropriated was a very small amount for such an enormous and important business. Upon inquiry I found at that office that they did not look after these writs of lunacy, excepting through a stenographer. Three hundred and sixty-five cases in one year in the District of Columbia attended to in one day a week, as the gentleman from Illinois suggested, is a rapidity that is dangerous. It is certainly a misfortune, but not necessarily a crime to be indigent, but it may become very dangerous to be indigent in the District of Columbia, if the indigent insane are going to be disposed of in a manner which might be described as "railroading."

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman understand from the corporation counsel's office that the indigent insane are "railroaded" to the detention hospital?

Mr. BRODHEAD. No; I was anticipating a condition from the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who suggested these things could be done one day in the week.

Mr. MANN. One day in two weeks. How long does the gentleman think it takes to try the ordinary insane case?

Mr. BRODHEAD. Well, the question of sanity and insanity is a very important matter, and it seems to me some judicial consideration ought to be given to it.

Mr. MANN. An ordinary insane case does not require any consideration—one minute's testimony of a physician.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Some of us would be in much danger if that is true and we did not have a chance to answer. There have been one or two cases in this District where persons have been rapidly committed as indigent insane and kept at the expense of the District for several years and subsequently found out that they were not indigent at all. There may be cases now where they are restrained, having been too hastily adjudged insane, where, in point of fact, they are not insane and have not got a chance to be heard because they are indigent.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not think anyone is interested—in an insane asylum or any other place—in keeping an indigent sane person in an insane asylum as an indigent insane person. Nobody is interested in keeping a sane person in an asylum who has not property. There is some point, it is true, that side of the House deserves to be——

Mr. BRODHEAD. I am afraid we will have many indigent insane if this Republican panic keeps up much longer.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman in charge of the bill used the much-used words a moment ago, "undesirable citizens." President Roosevelt is not the first man or the first great officer to use the term, the governor of Illinois being at least earlier than the President. But that is not what I want to talk about.

Is there any law on the District of Columbia statute books regulating vagrancy? That is the thought I have in mind, and I would like to know if there is any law on the local statute books against vagrants? Can anybody answer that question?

Mr. BOWERS. The gentleman should go to the District of Columbia Committee, which has authority to legislate upon the subject, and not call upon this committee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am willing to inquire of any committee, so I get the information. I want to know whether we have any law against vagrants in the District of Columbia, and I want to ask, if there is such a law, if the law is enforced? If there is such a law, I do not believe it is.

Mr. BURLESON. Inquire of the District of Columbia Committee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think there are more loafers, "hangers-on," idlers, vagrants, trying to "slip up on a living" to the square inch in Washington City than in any city I ever saw in my life. The people which are, or which become, members of this class seem to "blow in" here from all sections of this country, including foreign countries. There is another class, who are promised, directly or indirectly, usually before elections, that they will get jobs here after the elections if they will come to Washington. They come. They are unfortunate in failing to get a job; they get out of money, have or make but few friends; they will not return home or do manual labor, and they hang around here until they have no money and really have no visible means of support. Some of them, I am forced to believe, later on become professional idlers and invade the arteries of society from the bottom up, and sooner or later become a menace to the community. But wherever they come from and whoever they are and why they are here, the fact is, I believe, there are many professional idlers or vagrants in this city; and hence I make the very serious inquiry as to the vagrancy laws of this city and District, and I would like to know if we have any and if they are enforced.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee I will say we have a vagrancy law and it is enforced, and as an evidence of it the workhouse and jail are full, they being committed to them under that vagrancy law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It must be a feeble law or a very strong law feebly enforced, from the information I have and from my observation.

Mr. BURLESON. It is an imperfect law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. My friend from Texas, who is very well versed in these matters, says it is a very imperfect law, but just a moment, Mr. Chairman. In the State of Tennessee, I want to say, we were compelled a few years ago to strengthen our vagrancy laws and appeal to the courts of the State and municipal officers to vigorously enforce it, to get rid of vagrants and professional idlers hanging around the streets making it unpleasant for busy women and men to walk along the pavements. We got rid of the vagrant, this professional idler without visible means of support, and made him go to work—and there was plenty of work to do—or leave the State, and now we have a much better condition than we have had for years.

Now, these idlers are at work and but few vagrants are seen, and I think that if such a law as that was made to apply to Washington City we would have a better citizenship than we now have and we would have fewer women assaulted upon the streets and fewer brawls upon the highways, and we would have some peace and quiet and less talk on the subject. I am on the side of law and order. I want no man to make a living except by the sweat of his face, and when he thus makes it I want him to be—and he usually is—a good citizen. I say again, if we have a vagrancy law in this city, I do not believe it is enforced; and, if it is enforced, I say the law ought to be strengthened, and I have the word of my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] to bear witness to the fact that the law that we now have on the statute books is insufficient.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTEREST AND SINKING FUND.

For interest and sinking fund on the funded debt, $975,408.

Mr. FORNES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of inquiring whether there are any revenues derived in the District from public utilities or market privileges paid into the sinking fund?

Mr. MADDEN. Not paid into the sinking fund. They are paid into the treasury of the District.

Mr. FORNES. No revenues whatever paid into the sinking fund for the purpose of redemption of city bonds?

Mr. MADDEN. They are paid into the regular treasury of the District.

The Clerk read as follows:

Court-house, District of Columbia: For the following force necessary for the care and protection of the court-house in the District of Columbia, under the direction of the United States marshal of the District of Columbia: Engineer, $1,200; three watchmen, at $720 each; three firemen, at $720 each; five laborers, at $480 each; and three messengers, at $720 each; in all, $10,080, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney-General.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice this provision here provides for an engineer at $1,200; three watchmen, at $720 each; three firemen, at $720 each; five laborers, at $480 each; and three messengers, at $720 each; in all, $10,080. Now, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, this is a tremendous figure and an enormous expense for the care of a building of this kind. If all of these people are necessary, well and good; but it does seem to me that in the public buildings here in the District of Columbia, and, in fact, in all the Government buildings in the city of Washington, a much larger force is employed than is necessary to care for these buildings. There is a man at every door, every entrance, and every exit. In fact, in many instances, they are so thick and numerous they are actually in the way.

We all remember that not long ago there was a resolution introduced in the House asking that thirty-four men be employed to police the Office Building over here—the House Office Building. It was argued upon this floor that thirty-four men were needed; that they were necessary to police the building, to guard the entrances and keep order on the various floors. We all remember the fight that was made upon the floor in reference to the matter. An amendment was offered reducing it to ten, but it was argued that ten was not sufficient, and that many more than ten men were needed to care for this Office Building. The motion was lost. Then later, another amendment was offered making it fifteen, and that amendment prevailed. Fifteen men were employed to police the House Office Building, and those of us who have been occupying that building for the last three or four months have learned that even that number was unnecessary; that fifteen were twice as many as were really needed to care for that building. Now, I believe, Mr. Chairman, that all of the public buildings of this city should be carefully guarded and all taken care of. But I do not believe that it is right and proper, that it is economical, that it is fair to the people that pay the taxes of this country, to fill all the space in these public buildings with men drawing salaries at the expense of the people, when their services are not needed, and I believe that this amount of expense for caring for the court-house in the District of Columbia is unnecessary, is exorbitant, and should not be permitted to continue.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I know the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR] means to be fair and to make correct statements on the floor of the House. I will acquit him from any intention otherwise. The Committee on Appropriations brought in a bill to provide for thirty instead of thirty-four officers of the Office Building.

Mr. ADAIR. I will accept the amendment.

Mr. GOULDEN. Afterwards the Committee on Accounts brought in a measure asking for twenty-one, which was cut down to fifteen, as stated by the gentleman from Indiana. I desire to make this correction because I know the gentleman wants to have it correctly reported. I want to say that many of us differ from him so far as the proper officering of that building is concerned at the present time, and I do not believe that it is with the number of men which has been granted by the House.

Mr. MANN. No doubt about that. It has got too many officers who do nothing.

The Clerk read as follows:

REFORMATORIES AND CORRECTIONAL INSTITUTIONS.

For Washington Asylum: For superintendent, $1,600; visiting physician, $1,080; resident physician, $480; clerk, $840; property clerk, $1,000; baker, $600; principal overseer, $1,400; fifteen overseers, at $600 each; engineer, $720; assistant engineer, $480; second assistant engineer, $480; engineer at hospital for seven and one-half months, at $50 per month; engineer at new workhouse for seven and one-half months, at $50 per month; two watchmen, at $480 each; two night watchmen, at $548 each; blacksmith and woodworker, $500; carpenter, $500; driver for dead wagon, $365; hostler and driver, $240; keeper at female workhouse, $300; keeper at female workhouse, $180; hospital cook, $600; chief cook for workhouse, $600; four assistant cooks, at $180 each; trained nurse, who shall act as superintendent of nursing, $720; two graduate nurses, at $425 each; graduate nurse for receiving ward, $425; two nurses for tuberculosis wards, at $600 each; six orderlies, at $300 each; pupil nurses, not less than twenty in number (nurses to be paid not to exceed $120 per annum during first year of service, and not to exceed $150 per annum during second year of service) $2,625; registered pharmacist, who shall act as hospital clerk, $720; gardener, $540; herdsman, $365; florist, $300; tailor, $180; housekeeper, $300; laundryman, $600; temporary labor, not to exceed $2,400; in all, $38,416.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 73, in line 9, strike out "tuberculosis wards, at six hundred" and insert "annex wards, at four hundred and twenty-five;" and in line 22 strike out "four hundred and sixteen" and insert "and sixty-six."

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. In explanation of that amendment, Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that the tuberculosis patients will be transferred to the tuberculosis hospital early in the next fiscal year, and the two nurses are desired in the annex that is now being prepared.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Reform School for Girls: Superintendent, $1,200; treasurer, $600; matron, $600; three teachers, at $600 each; overseer, $720; six teachers of industries, at $480 each; engineer, $600; assistant engineer, $420; night watchman, $365; two laborers, at $300 each; in all, $9,785.

Mr. GARRETT. I move to strike out the last word. Can the gentleman state how many girls there are in this reform school?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Between 70 and 90, I think.

Mr. GARRETT. Is that the average number?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Somewhere near the average. A very excellent institution, by the way.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hospital for the Insane: For support of the indigent insane of the District of Columbia in the Government Hospital for the Insane in said District, as provided by law, $280,000.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the bill if he knows the condition of the Hospital for the Insane—that is, whether or not it is unduly crowded. I noticed that the appropriation here is $280,000, whereas the Secretary of the Treasury recommends a larger amount. I want to know if the gentleman was informed whether the hospital was large enough and they were being properly taken care of or unduly crowded?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I think an affirmative answer may be made to the first two propositions and a negative answer to the last; that they are not unduly crowded and that they are taken as good care of as is given in first-class asylums of the kind throughout the country.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Then the gentleman was convinced that the amount recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury was too large?

Mr. BOWERS. The Secretary of the Treasury made no recommendation.

Mr. BRODHEAD. He transmitted the estimates, did he not?

Mr. BOWERS. The Secretary of the Treasury transmitted the estimates made by the District Commissioners without comment.

Mr. BRODHEAD. And in the opinion of the committee the amount of the estimate was too much?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The committee gave to this question, as it gave to all others, careful investigation, and recommended an appropriation which they thought would meet the necessities.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the extension of and maintaining the high-service system of water distribution, laying necessary service and trunk mains for low service, and purchasing, installing, and maintaining water meters on services to such private residences as may be directed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, said meters at all times to remain the property of the District of Columbia, to include all necessary land, machinery, buildings, mains, and appurtenances, and labor, and the purchase and maintenance of horses, wagons, carts, and harness necessary for the proper execution of this work, so much as may be available in the water fund during the fiscal year 1909, after providing for the expenditures hereinbefore authorized, is hereby appropriated.

Mr. GARRETT. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question of the gentleman from Michigan or the gentleman from Illinois. I remember two years ago, or last year, the policy of instituting meters was adopted. Some objections were made to that at the time. I should like to ask the gentleman how that policy has worked. Has it proven satisfactory?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The policy of installing meters is gradually being carried out. About 20 per cent of the takers of water are using meters, and the result is entirely satisfactory from the standpoint of saving in the consumption of water.

Mr. GARRETT. It saves in economical use of the water?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARRETT. Has there been any complaint? I remember it was urged here it would work a hardship, particularly during the summer months, upon the poorer people of the city. Has it been tried with them, and can the gentleman say whether it has in fact worked any hardship on them?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. In reply to that, I can only say that no complaint, so far as I have knowledge, has been brought to the attention of the committee, nor do I know of any elsewhere.

Mr. MANN. I think, if the gentleman will permit, complaint when the matter first came up was that the poorer people would be inclined not to use as much water as would be good for them if they paid for it by meter.

Mr. GARRETT. That was the point that was made.

Mr. MANN. They are not likely to make complaint and urge that they be required to use more water.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say that it does appear to the committee that the poorer people, or the people who are using meters, are using as much water as ever, and at half the expense it has heretofore cost them. Some of the users inform us that their water bills have been cut in two in the middle.

Mr. GARRETT. I understood from the gentleman from Mississippi that the meters had not yet really been installed except in the places of business of large users, so that really they have not reached that class concerning which I was seeking information.

Mr. TAWNEY. I remember a number of small users—ordinary residences.

Mr. NORRIS. What was the provision of law as to the installation of meters?

Mr. MADDEN. The introduction of meters is altogether under the direction of the Commissioners. The purpose is to make the water service more adequate for the needs of the District.

Mr. NORRIS. They expect ultimately that every house will have a meter?

Mr. MADDEN. The intention is that ultimately every house shall have a meter.

Mr. NORRIS. Is there any limitation as to when this shall be done?

Mr. MADDEN. They are putting them in as fast as it can be done with the money which they can afford to spend for that purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. They use their discretion as to where the meters shall be put in?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill what is the cost to the consumer of water under the meter system?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It costs about 4 cents for a thousand gallons.

Mr. NORRIS. Is that a sufficient amount, so that there is no loss to the District?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It is a gain to the District.

Mr. NORRIS. It is a profit, even at that?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. From and after the approval of this act all per diem employees and other day laborers of the District of Columbia who have been continuously employed for five working days next preceding the first Monday of September in each year (commonly called Labor Day), and whose employment continues through and beyond said day, may, in the discretion of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, be granted leave of absence with pay for said day.

Mr. MACON. I make a point of order against the provision of the bill just read.

Mr. MANN. Which provision is that?

Mr. MACON. Section 6, page 97.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, we do not contend that this is not subject to a point of order, but we do feel that it is just to the laborers that on this day they have the same privileges extended to them that they would have if they were in the employ of private corporations, and that for Labor Day they receive their pay from the Government the same as laborers in private employment. I hope the gentleman will not press his point of order.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman contend that every private corporation which has had a man in its employ for five days only extends to him a holiday and pays him for the day, too?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That does not cover the question.

Mr. TAWNEY. It says through that day.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It says, "and whose employment continues through and beyond said day."

Mr. MACON. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the pending amendments and with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DALZELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 20063, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and had instructed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments and with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Sundry messages, in writing, from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. LATTA, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On April 6, 1908:

H. R. 9079. An act to extend to Port Arthur, in the State of Texas, the privilege of immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise; and

H. R. 10075. An act for the relief of Copiah County, Miss.

On April 7, 1908:

H. R. 19955. An act making appropriations to supply certain additional urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The Speaker announced his signature to an enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 4260. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved June 29, 1906.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted:

To Mr. LEVER, for one week, on account of sickness.

To Mr. BURTON of Ohio, for one day, on account of important business.

DAM ACROSS SAVANNAH RIVER AT CHEROKEE SHOALS—VETO MESSAGE.

The Speaker laid before the House the following message from the President:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, House bill 16621.

This bill is returned for the reason that the title does not correspond to the substance of the act. The bill, by title, merely extends the time for the construction of a dam across Savannah River at Cherokee Shoals; but, as a matter of fact, it changes the designation of the grantee and repeals the original act, thus practically making a new measure. It is not quite clear what the effect of these changes would be; but the form of the bill is so defective that it should not in any event be signed. An opportunity was afforded to withdraw it to correct these defects, but was not availed of.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 7, 1908.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, what disposition has been made of that?

The SPEAKER. It is not disposed of.

EXTENSION OF WASHINGTON RAILWAY AND ELECTRIC COMPANY AND OTHER COMPANIES.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I submit a conference report on the bill S. 902, authorizing certain extensions to be made in the lines of the Washington Railway and Electric Company, the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company, the City and Suburban Railway of Washington, and the Capital Traction Company, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, to be printed in the RECORD under the rules.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE BRICK.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, it is my painful duty to announce to the House the death of my colleague, the Hon. ABRAHAM L. BRICK, Representative from the Thirteenth Congressional District of Indiana. At a later date I shall ask the House to set apart a suitable time to listen to appropriate testimonials on the life, character, and public services of the deceased. I now offer the following resolutions:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. ABRAHAM L. BRICK, a Representative from the State of Indiana.

Resolved, That a committee of sixteen Members of the House be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now recess until Wednesday, April 8, at 11.30 o'clock a. m.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to all the resolutions save the last.

The question was taken, and the resolutions, except the last, were unanimously agreed to.

In accordance with the resolution the Chair appointed as a committee to attend the funeral Mr. OVERSTREET, Mr. WATSON, Mr. CRUMPACKER, Mr. HOLLIDAY, Mr. CHANEY, Mr. FOSTER of Indiana, Mr. GILHAMS, Mr. DIXON, Mr. COX of Indiana, Mr. GILLETT, Mr. GRAFF, Mr. BOWERS, Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan, Mr. COLE, Mr. LLOYD, and Mr. ALEXANDER of New York.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the last resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.), the House was in recess until to-morrow at 11.30 a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 8, 1908.

[Continuation of legislative day of Monday, April 6, 1908.]

The recess having expired, at 11 o'clock and 30 minutes a. m. the House was called to order by the Speaker.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, by the direction of that committee, reported the bill (H. R. 20471) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GREGG reserved all points of order on the bill.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] be permitted to file minority views on the naval bill during the day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

DAM ACROSS SAVANNAH RIVER AT CHEROKEE SHOALS.

The SPEAKER. The question now is, Will the House reconsider the passing of the bill (H. R. 16621) vetoed by the President in a message read before the recess yesterday?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will it not be in order to send the bill back to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce?

Mr. PAYNE. It can go back to the committee by unanimous consent, and I do not object to it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill referred to, vetoed by the President, be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I shall be forced, under the circumstances, to object. I may not later, after I understand it.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Mississippi will pardon me, the veto message of the President calls attention to the fact, which I believe is a fact——

Mr. WILLIAMS. What bill is it?

Mr. MANN. It is a bill permitting the building of a dam across the Savannah River at Cherokee Shoals.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Concerning that matter, Mr. Speaker, I shall make no objections.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

WILLIAM WILMOT WHITE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without approval House bill No. 4763, entitled "An act transferring Commander William Wilmot White from the retired to the active list of the Navy."

I inclose herewith copy of the reports of the Secretary of the Navy and of the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation adverse to the signature of this bill. The report of the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation gives the precedents which this bill follows. In each case special reasons were believed to exist at the time why a special exception should be made, but actual experience has shown that in each case the restoration served as a precedent for the restoration of somebody else where the cause was not quite so strong. Commander White was transferred to the retired list three years ago on his own application. He now seeks reinstatement. All the advantages that should be derived from the legislation under which he was retired will be lost if the various individuals who take advantage of it are encouraged to believe that whenever they desire to undo their action that end can be achieved by supplemental special legislation. I agree entirely with Admiral Pillsbury's statement that legislation of this character does not contribute to the best interests of the service. I accordingly return the bill without my approval.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 7, 1908.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House on reconsideration pass the bill, the President's veto to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Some of the Members of the House did not have an opportunity to hear the message, and I will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to explain.

Mr. PAYNE. This man was on the retired list, and the bill puts him on the active list.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the President vetoed the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. And it was a good veto, too.

The SPEAKER. The Constitution requires that this vote shall be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be reported to the House.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill may be reported for information.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to its being reported, although the message shows clearly what it is.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to appoint, by and with the consent of the Senate, William Wilmot White, now a commander on the retired list of the Navy, a commander on the active list of the United States Navy, to take rank next above Commander Emil Theiss, United States Navy: Provided, That the said William Wilmot White shall be carried as additional to the number of the grade to which he may be appointed under this act or at any time thereafter promoted: And provided further, That the said William Wilmot White shall not by the passage of this act be entitled to back pay of any kind: And provided further, That the said William Wilmot White shall pass a physical examination before said transfer, showing his fitness to enter the active service of the Navy.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House on reconsideration pass the bill, the President's veto to the contrary notwithstanding? and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—nays 258, answered "present" 15, not voting 114, as follows:

For the session:

Mr. SHERMAN with Mr. RIORDAN.

Mr. CURRIER with Mr. FINLEY.

Mr. KNOPF with Mr. WEISSE.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 18754. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, a question of privilege.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the newspapers of this morning very generally report that upon yesterday in the Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress there occurred a personal difficulty between members of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that that is not a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to state, so far.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman has stated the gravamen of the case, to wit, that "the newspapers had stated there was a personal difficulty in the room of the Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Members of Congress." Now, I submit that whether there was or was not, is not a question of privilege for the gentleman to raise in the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the circumstances it seems to the Chair if the difficulty touched public business pending before a committee of the House that it might be. The Chair does not say at this time whether it would be a question of privilege or not, but the Chair can conceive that it might be.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. If the gentleman will permit me a moment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I believe a parliamentary inquiry has precedence, and the gentleman must allow the minority some few of such rights as they have left—a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. If the Chair shall rule or does rule that the question raised by the gentleman from West Virginia is a privileged question, then could gentlemen upon this side also rise to a question of personal privilege to explain what they regard as their side of the controversy?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not state as to that. It does not necessarily follow that a debating school is to be organized, but the Chair states that under the precedents questions of high privilege from time to time—even in one case a difficulty between Members on the portico of the Capitol was held to be a question of high privilege. The Chair can not state at this time. The gentleman from West Virginia will proceed.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, it might clear the atmosphere a little bit if I would state that what I propose to say is a mere statement of facts and is known to gentlemen on the minority side and to those most concerned. I shall not take the time of the House to read or to have read at length any newspaper article upon this subject. I do not deem that anything I have seen deserves to be dignified by being quoted in the RECORD.

In order, however, to designate the articles to which I have referred, I will read but one sentence from a newspaper of this morning, as follows:

Statesmen forgot their dignity and made violent efforts to do bodily injury to other statesmen.

Mr. SULZER. What is the name of the newspaper?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order that it does not reflect on the gentleman in his representative capacity.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that it does, or that it may, if it be a difficulty, as alleged, over the public business by a committee of the House. The gentleman from West Virginia is recognized.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that no such thing occurred or anything like it.

Mr. SULZER. What is the name of the newspaper?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. There were no blows delivered, there were none aimed, none dodged, and the situation did not even approach personal difficulty in any sense whatever.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if I have any time, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], a minority member of the committee.

Mr. HARDWICK. I just want to say, in support of the gentleman's statement, that while at this committee meeting there might have been political and parliamentary differences there was not the slightest personal difficulty or anything that approached it, and that part of these newspaper articles to which the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES] has referred are entirely and absolutely without foundation in fact. [Applause.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on this day and on Thursday of this week the House shall take a recess at 5 o'clock p. m. until 11.30 a. m. of the next Calendar day; that on Friday, April 10, at 11.30 a. m., the Speaker shall declare the House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 20471, the naval appropriation bill; that at 5 o'clock p. m. on Friday, April 10, the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall declare the committee in recess until 11.30 a. m. on Saturday, April 11; that at 5 o'clock p. m. Saturday, April 11, the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall declare the committee in recess until 11.30 o'clock a. m. on Monday, April 13.

That general debate on the naval appropriation bill shall close not later than at 5 o'clock p. m., Saturday, April 11; the time to be equally divided between the majority and minority and controlled by the chairman of the Naval Committee and by the senior member of the minority: Provided, That if general debate shall be concluded prior to 5 p. m. on Saturday the 11th, the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole shall at once declare the committee in recess until Monday, April 13, at 11.30 a. m.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the previous question.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] were appointed as tellers.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 142, noes 112.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 158, nays 129, answered "present" 11, not voting 89, as follows:

So the previous question was ordered.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. HEPBURN with Mr. BURLESON.

Mr. BRUMM with Mr. COCKRAN.

Mr. MCCREARY with Mr. MAYNARD.

Mr. BOUTELL with Mr. GRIGGS.

For the balance of the day:

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin with Mr. WILEY.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to twenty minutes. The gentleman from Missouri rises to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have tried four times this morning to get recognition to call up a privileged resolution. I ask when I may call it up?

The SPEAKER. The House has been engaged in privileged business ever since the hammer fell this morning. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Let us have order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. All gentlemen will be seated and cease conversation.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is intended to provide the order of business for the House from now until next Monday. According to the terms of the rule, the House will take a recess this evening at 5 o'clock until half past 11 to-morrow, and to-morrow evening will take a recess at 5 o'clock until half past 11 o'clock on Friday. On Friday the Speaker will declare the House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the naval appropriation bill, and on Friday evening the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union will take a recess until Saturday morning at half past 11 o'clock, and on Saturday evening at 5 o'clock—or, possibly, by the terms of the rule, a little earlier—the House will take a recess until Monday morning at 11.30. General debate on the naval appropriation bill will close not later than 5 o'clock on Saturday evening, and should it close earlier than 5 o'clock the Chairman of the committee will declare the committee in recess until Monday morning. The time for debate on the naval appropriation bill is to be equally divided between the two sides, to be controlled on this side of the Chamber by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs and on the other side of the Chamber by the senior representative of the minority on that committee. I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], for nine minutes. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, those who made the Constitution, a long number of years ago, were improvident enough to include in that instrument a provision by virtue of which one-fifth of the Members present could have a yea-and-nay vote. Doubtless they thought at the time that it was wisdom and that there would be good in results from this provision.

The rule which we are considering, and no doubt about to adopt by a partisan vote, is to negative as far as may be possible that provision of the Constitution. It is offensive to the gentlemen on the other side to have a yea-and-nay vote upon propositions to be passed upon. This is a device to escape that yea-and-nay vote as far as possible. The gentlemen desire to keep off the record whenever it is possible to keep off the record.

It may be suggested that the purpose of this rule is to economize time. What a beautiful suggestion, and how artful that must be, coming from the other side. How long since was it that time was wantonly wasted here? Bills were brought forward and kept before the House for the sole purpose of consuming time and preventing the consideration of other matters. Adjournments were taken three days at a time in order to get rid of time, to dispose of that useless commodity. Now, the gentlemen have reached that stage in the progress of legislation when it becomes very important, they would have the country believe and would have us believe, to economize time; and the mere circumstance that a provision of the Constitution intervenes of course is a circumstance easily brushed aside by the gentlemen by virtue of that rule.

The gentlemen perhaps are furnishing an illustration and conveying information to the country beyond their purpose, and possibly it may turn out later on to their sorrow. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When rules such as this may be adopted—and no doubt this will be adopted by a partisan vote—when rules likes this can be adopted for the purpose of economizing time, as it may be pretended, and to get around a provision of the Constitution in actual fact, the gentlemen who adopt it demonstrate to the House and demonstrate to the country beyond the possibility of mistake or misunderstanding that whatever legislation the majority here sees proper to pass, the majority here can pass. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It must appear further that whatever is not passed here the majority distinctly and purposely prevents the passage of. [Applause on the Democratic side.] No longer will the ordinary excuse avail that there was a lack of time, so that this measure could not be reached upon the Calendar, and that measure could not be brought out of committee. You are furnishing now an absolute demonstration, from the conclusiveness of which there is no escape, that there is not a solitary measure pending in committee or in the House that you can not pass if you choose to pass it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And it will be demonstrated with equal clearness that whatever is not passed is that which you deliberately, purposely, defiantly decide shall not pass. Now, the test can be made very easily, and later on, as I suggested, it may be made to your sorrow.

When the question is asked anywhere in the country—and it will be asked—why was not this measure considered, why was not that measure passed, why was not the other measure brought up? there is one answer, and only one: Because the Republican majority in this House willed that it should not be considered, should not be brought up, should not be passed. We can stand upon that record. It is well known that there is pressure in the country, and very great pressure, for the consideration and passage of a number of important measures. It is well known that a large majority of the voting strength of the country is insistent upon the consideration and the passage of important measures. Do not go to them again, as you have done so often and so successfully, and endeavor to delude them into the belief that somehow you could not get consideration for the measure and somehow you could not pass it. You can have consideration, because you have the power to enforce it; and, so far as meritorious measures are concerned, as has been demonstrated here more than once and will be demonstrated again, and abundantly demonstrated, you have only to express the will, you have only to give the opportunity, and if you lack the votes upon that side, as you do not, there will be an abundant addition here. And there are a good many measures which would receive practically, and some of them actually, every vote upon this side. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Take the employers' liability bill which passed the other day, 300 ayes to 1 no. There are other measures that would pass with almost equal unanimity if there were opportunity to pass them. They would get a large vote, because a good many—a majority—desire to pass them, and because a good many, but not a majority, dare not vote against them. [Applause.]

Now, the process of strangulation will no longer be a secret process. You may conclude that you can strangle measures in committee, and you may conclude that you can delude the country into believing that you can not act upon them, but your hope will be vain. You are now demonstrating, you demonstrate over again by this rule, as you have demonstrated repeatedly, that what the majority wills to do, the majority can do, and what the majority wills shall not be done, that and that only can not be done in this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You have brought the responsibility which rests upon you into the light so clear and so glaring that all men must judge you by what you do and by what you refuse to do, because it is a refusal direct and positive. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You now refuse the roll call, you are now economizing time by going through the provisions of the Constitution as so much waste paper. You will be called to the test and you will have to stand it. You are responsible for the failure of everything that fails to pass. If it be a good thing not to pass a bill you can take the credit for killing it; you have the power of life and death over it. Wherever a meritorious measure fails of passage or fails of consideration it fails because you will not give it consideration, and it fails of passage because you will not permit of its passage. You kill it just as completely and just as clearly as if you employed a manlier course and submitted it to vote and voted against it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eighteen minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. I now yield nine minutes to my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, the solicitude of the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] on behalf of himself and his colleagues for the sanctity of the Constitution of the United States is decidedly refreshing. It is within the memory of most of us in this Chamber, and those in whose memory it is not have read in history, that the time was, Mr. Speaker, not so very long ago when the Democratic party was not so solicitous for the Constitution as my honored friend from Missouri appears to be to-day. Their solicitude to-day seems to be over the matter of having useless roll calls. The absence of solicitude half a century ago was in reference to a question of vastly greater consequence, a question which involved not a mere matter of procedure, but the matter of the life of the nation, and I am glad that the time has at last come when our Democratic friends are so solicitous that the Constitution should be sacredly lived up to. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman from Missouri intimates that the Republican side of the House desires to do away with the roll calls because of some fear of making a record upon some question before the House. Mr. Speaker, the Republican party in this House, the Republican party in this nation, is prepared to-day to accept full responsibility, not only for everything that is done, but for that which is not done in the way of legislation and administration. [Applause on the Republican side.] We recognize the fact, sir, that this Government to-day is Republican in all its branches. We recognize the fact that we have a Republican President, brave, wise, and courageous. We recognize that we have a Republican majority in the Senate, that we have a Republican majority in this House that is ready to resort to every legal, every proper constitutional right to enact such legislation as it deems for the best interest for the greatest number of our people, and which is willing and ready to accept full responsibility for all those measures which are introduced here and which are not enacted into law. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We are not anxious, Mr. Speaker, to avoid responsibility. The Republican party has always been ready to accept full responsibility when it has been in power, and in that respect I must say to my honored friend from Missouri that it is in direct contrast to the Democratic party, which, even when it has had the power, has lacked the courage to carry out its declared policies. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The rule which has been proposed here, Mr. Speaker, is nothing extraordinary; it is a method laid down by the House procedure by which the majority can enact such legislation as it deems wise. It is practically and substantially the same procedure that was carried out in the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses, when our Democratic friends were in a majority and when they were responsible for legislation. They invoked the action of the Committee on Rules, properly so, and that is what the Republican party in this House do to-day, Mr. Speaker; they resort, not to unusual methods, but to methods laid down by the rules, laid down by the law, to enact legislation, and not waste the time in useless and senseless roll calls.

The Democratic party, Mr. Speaker, under its present leadership in the House, I assume, believes that they are making great political capital by the filibuster of the past two weeks; but, Mr. Speaker, in my judgment they are not deceiving the country. The country knows that the way to progress is not to put on the brakes. The country knows, even if the Democratic party does not know, Mr. Speaker, that the way to move forward is to move forward and not attempt to block the wheels of progress.

But it is Democratic policy; it has been heretofore, and I assume it will be long afterwards for many years yet to come, to attempt to move forward as the crab does—by moving backward. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] That is not Republican policy. The country is not deceived. The country is looking to the Republican party to enact certain legislation. It is looking to the Republican party to enact the great appropriation bills for carrying on this Government, and it is looking to this House to enact those laws in the speediest possible time, and to adjourn this House, and that is what the Republican party proposes to do. Our Democratic friends will discover, I expect, one of these days that they have not made the political capital out of the maneuvers of last week that they supposed they would. Democratic hindsight is always superior to Democratic foresight, Mr. Speaker. In that respect I think their situation can be described in the little verselet about the bug, with which we are all familiar, and which runs:

> The lightning bug is brilliant; but it has not any mind;
> It stumbles through existence, with its headlight on behind.

[Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

That is just what the Democratic party is doing now. Its headlight is on behind. It seems to see nothing in the future; it seems to be attempting to deceive the country with the idea that it is accomplishing undesirable legislation, forcing the Republican party to do that which that party does not deem to be wise, forcing it in its forward progress by hanging on to the wheels of progress, attempting to prevent that vehicle from moving forward. But, Mr. Speaker, the Republican party, mindful of its obligation to the country, will, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] admits, adopt this rule and proceed, accepting full responsibility for its every act, and enact such legislation as it deems wise, pass the great appropriation bills, and then go to the country upon the record that it has made here, confident that the country understands the whole situation and will approve what has been done. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he expects to use all of his remaining time in one speech?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes; in one speech.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, my friend from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], who has just taken his seat, says that the Republican party is "ready to enact" remedial legislation; that it is "ready to assume responsibility." Mr. Speaker, a little poem which I shall entitle "Ready to enact," being after Thomas Bailey Aldrich, might, perhaps, interest the House, might interest the country, too, although that phrase—the country—outrages the sensibilities of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. It reads as follows:

"READY TO ENACT."

(After Thomas Bailey Aldrich.)

I wonder what day of the week,
I wonder what month of the year—
Will it be winter or summer,
And who of us then will be here?

What a glorious fancy to dream!
How full of delight and of lure!
How soft is the Congressman's speech,
And yet how entrancingly sure!

The thought gives a thrilling of joy,
Inspiring the doubter with cheer—
But * * * I wonder what day of the week,
I wonder what month of the year!

Mr. Speaker, as is well known to all of you, I am a very remarkably good-natured man, and in view of that fact it is not strange that this huge, balky, bulky, undecided, halting, hesitating, hammered, screaming, screeching, "cussing," and, as it would have the country believe, helpless, majority has finally succeeded in exciting my commiseration, aye, my pity. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Already with the power of recognition, already with two men to one on every committee, with the power of closing debate whenever it chooses, with the Reed rules in full force back of them, these rules that were said to be perfect "to do business," having already cut off prayer even when we meet [laughter on the Democratic side], thereby acknowledging themselves beyond redemption [laughter], this great, huge, unwieldy majority, handled, as you would have the country believe, so skillfully by the triumvirate, has had to resort to three special rules. Mr. Speaker, even there the boasts of your side have gone by the board. The other day the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], like Sir Bombastes Furioso, rose upon the floor and wanted the world to know that the majority would consider what it pleased, when it pleased, and vote on nothing except what it pleased.

During the same legislative day we knocked that boast off of his lips [applause on the Democratic side], because we forced him and that side whether he and it would or not, to vote upon a proposition to secure free wood pulp, and upon another to secure a modification of the injunction laws in the interest of the reservation of the rights of the States, and upon a proposition for the modification of the injunction laws in the interests of labor. Upon these propositions every Democrat present rose on division and later passed through the tellers in favor of each proposition and every Republican against each of them. None of you then present can deny truthfully the fact that you had the opportunity to vote and did, as a matter of fact, vote against each of these measures and were forced to vote. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We were just ready to make you vote again upon a campaign contribution publicity bill when the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] rose to his feet and moved that the committee "do now rise." So that even the idle boasts have fallen to the ground.

Mr. Speaker, I feel sorry for you, especially. The cartoonists find it difficult, Mr. Speaker, to make pictures of you or me uglier than ordinary photographs of us, but they have gotten to a point where you have to such a degree excited their pity that they have succeeded. I hold in my hand a picture—I will call it a photograph, it looks so natural—of you, Mr. Speaker, with your hat flying in the air, your cigar turned downward, which shows perturbation upon your part. You are riding upon the rear haunches of the elephant, while the elephant is spouting back through his trunk in your face. How much of the Republican membership of the House constitutes the spouting or rebelling trunk, I can not say.

The Speaker is riding upon saddlebags and upon the visible or hither side of the saddlebags we see a "Roosevelt budget." Out of the budget has already dropped the employers' liability bill that you Republicans kept in committee for three months. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I see emerging from it the titles of the other things to which we on this side have called the attention of the country, and the perspiration is rolling down the Speaker's face like great drops of water in an August shower. I find, Mr. Speaker, another picture [showing it], and I would ask unanimous consent to be allowed to insert this in the RECORD. [Great applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, the other day the newspapers undertook to report what had happened in the House after I had made a quorum—which I was by no means compelled to do—of the Committee on Rules, because I thought that a nice sense of honor required me to do it, although the pair with my sick friend, Mr. SHERMAN of New York, in committees did not, and although literally I was not compelled to do it, but because, he being sick and at his house, I wanted him to feel no mental anxiety. Then the gentleman from Pennsylvania came in afterwards, after that courtesy extended to the Republicans in the committee, and cut me off even from the poor opportunity to reply to what was an insulting speech—insulting to this entire side. In reporting this, however, the paper says, "Mr. WILLIAMS is fighting mad."

Why, Mr. Speaker, no paper ever made a greater mistake. Nothing could make me grow angry with the gentleman from Pennsylvania. My temper is so good I seldom grow angry with anybody, and when I do I do it with the captain, not with the lieutenant—with the principal and not the agent. When I do, it is with Sir John Falstaff himself, not with his page. [Applause on the Democratic side.] How could I grow angry with a mere appendage? The time never existed in the House or in the State of Pennsylvania when my very dear friend the Hon. JOHN DALZELL ever had a separate command of any description.

Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps necessary for me to recur to a few words said the other day. The gentleman indulged in some language which shows he was driven beyond good nature, argument, and reason. You on that side had previously to that changed your rules of the game to suit your hand; you had previously to that broken your plighted word, and then the gentleman broke his temper as well and said that this side had indulged in a plan of campaign that was "idiotic," that was "asinine," that was "disgraceful for grown men." Mr. Speaker, I do not indulge in language of that sort, but if I were disposed to do it I might in a way ask the country—the country, I hope the gentleman from New York will understand, as well as the House—ask the country whether anything could be more "idiotic," whether anything could be more genuinely and truly "asinine," whether anything could be more of a "disgrace to grown men" than to lose one's temper where great parties are fighting one another, each according to its notion of what is right and possible to secure or to prevent the passage of great measures. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I merely ask those questions. I hope there is nobody who really has lost his temper, but if there be any on either side of the Chamber, what a great fool he has been, what a fool would I be, for example, to lose my temper because the leaders on the other side do not want the President and us to legislate, but the President and we are going to legislate a little bit before we get through, all the same. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I predict now we will get out a woodpulp bill this Congress. I can not predict we will get a campaign contribution publicity bill because it is too near election when Republicans need all the secretly contributed campaign funds they can get. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Late information from the newspapers as to what has been happening around the Capitol is that the Republicans, either under instructions or without them, I know not which——

A MEMBER. With them.

Mr. WILLIAMS (continuing). Will resort to every sort of obstructive tactics to keep the Republicans of this House from getting an opportunity to vote in favor of a campaign contributions publicity bill. Mr. Speaker, I had here a moment ago a cartoon of a great cone turned upside down, and under it a lot of legs are just protruding and the Speaker of the House is holding the cone down. Here it is. The cone is marked "Special rule." Do you know whose legs those are that are hampered within the cone held by the Speaker and just protruding here?

Do you think they are Democratic legs? Why, no. You could have rendered us harmless—"cabined, cribbed, and confined" us without any special rules. You did not need them. You have power to control us under the Reed rules. Everybody knows it. These legs are the legs of Members of Congress who are Republicans, squelched and deprived of voice and visible legislative efficacy by the Speaker and the Committee on Ways and Means. [Loud and long continued applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I shall not enter into any dispute with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] as to my rank in this House or in the State of Pennsylvania or elsewhere. "I had rather be a doorkeeper in the House of my God than to dwell in the tents of wickedness." [Loud applause on the Republican side.] On every occasion when the gentleman from Mississippi has addressed the House since he inaugurated this unseemly filibuster he has appealed not only to the House, but to the country. I want to appeal to the country toward its enlightenment in the few words I shall say here at this time. This filibuster is not only unseemly, but it is unjustifiable and indefensible. And I shall preface what I have to say by reading an account of an interview published in the Washington Post of yesterday, as follows:

A prominent Democrat spoke his mind very freely against the JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS tactics, and in substantially this language:

"I am a Democrat, and I favor Democratic measures, especially if decided by caucus, but this filibustering does not strike me as the proper way to do, as statesmen, nor by way of rebuke. Now, when some great question is involved, as in the times when the Republican House attempted to give the country a bad dose of the "force bill," it is not only pardonable, but commendable, for the Democratic leaders to resort to every imaginable medium of obstruction and delay.

"While it is true that the Republicans were inclined to disregard the expressed wishes of the President and were slow to pass legislation that was admittedly good, yet these measures are and were all the time Republican, and it was not our business to obstruct in order to go ahead. Besides, the Congress is largely Republican, and that party is held responsible to the country for all needed legislation. We could not pass anything, if we wanted to, unless the Republican side of the House was willing. What's the use in Democrats fooling themselves by calling any of these important Administration bills Democratic? I intend to stick to my crowd, but I do not favor the methods we have been pursuing."

[Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, possibly there are times when a filibuster is justifiable, as in the Fiftieth Congress, when there was a filibuster against the direct tax; as in the Fifty-second Congress, when the Republican minority, by filibuster, compelled the Democrats to adopt the Reed rules in order to count a quorum, when, as this Democrat says, there was an attempt to pass a force bill upon the Democratic party. But in this Congress there has been no possible excuse for a filibuster or the obstruction of legislation. The majority has proceeded in an orderly, decent way to pass the great appropriation bills, upon which the very existence of the Government depends. No right has been denied to the minority. There has been no limitation upon debate. For every recognition by unanimous consent, recognition by the Speaker of a Republican, there has been a corresponding recognition of a Democrat upon the other side of this House. There is no possible excuse, I say. The business of the House is further advanced than was the business of the House at a similar period in the last Congress. I have here a comparative statement.

Mr. Speaker, I want to be interrupted when I have consumed all but three minutes of my time.

In the Fifty-ninth Congress six of the twelve annual appropriation bills had been reported to the House—the Army, fortifications, Indian, legislative, pension, and post-office. In this Congress eight of the twelve regular annual appropriation bills have been reported to the House, namely, agriculture, Army, District of Columbia, fortifications, Indian, legislative, pension, and post-office. In the last Congress two had passed the Senate, namely, the fortifications and the pension appropriation bills. In this Congress all have passed the House except the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which is now ready to pass, and two bills have passed the Senate, namely, the Indian and the legislative bill. So that, Mr. Speaker, what I say is absolutely, mathematically correct. There exists no possible excuse and there exists no possible justification for this unseemly filibuster.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has three minutes remaining.

Mr. DALZELL. I shall not repeat what I said the other day at any great length as to the childishness of the performance that we have seen enacted here within the last few days. I will only call attention to the antics of the gentlemen on the other side in the Committee of the Whole the other day when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] moved to strike out the first six lines of the paragraph. Was not that a childish proceeding? Why, the gentleman is down in his autobiography as a lawyer, and if there be any doubt on the subject the Speaker has given him the benefit of the doubt and put him on the Committee on the Judiciary; and the gentleman is 44 years of age. I would like to know when a Texas statesman gets out of his childhood. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I would like to ask if the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] did not move to strike out "Congress" the other day? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. I would go on if I had the time and cite the other amendments that were offered, but I have not the time.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] himself is over 50 years of age. It must have been fifty years ago since that pathetic scene took place at Grand Junction when little Johnny and his black nurse were there. And, as the gentleman from Mississippi quotes poetry, I trust he will allow me to indulge in the same amusement.

There was a dear little boy named Johnny,
And he had a dear old nurse named Luce.
They were on their way to Grand Junction
When a Chinese gong broke loose.

"Heavens," said Luce,
"What's that, d'yo suppose?"
"Never mind," said Johnny,
"It's only a call for ayes and noes."

And when at length Johnny grew up
And shed his homespun clothes,
To Congress he went and became so great
That he could call for the ayes and noes.

And when his head had swelled so large
That he had no mind for repose,
The little fellow 'round looked on with delight,
While Johnny called for the ayes and noes.

Oh, great is Johnny of Grand Junction,
Much greater than you would suppose,
But he is greatest of all in his function
Of calling for the ayes and noes.

Dear old Lucy! She is ashes,
But the fame of her Johnny still grows,
While day by day he surpasses
In calling for the ayes and noes.

And when his life shall be written
And he in his tomb shall repose,
Posterity will learn that he was greatest
When he was calling for the ayes and noes.

[Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division of the resolution. I call the attention of the Speaker to Rule XVI, paragraph 6, which provides:

On the demand of any Member, before the question is put, a question shall be divided if it include propositions so distinct in substance that one being taken away a substantive proposition shall remain.

In this resolution there are at least six distinctive propositions, any one of which being taken away, a distinct substantive proposition remains. The only precedent on this point as collated in the Digest is one where a resolution was introduced providing for the adoption of the rules of one Congress as the rules of the succeeding Congress.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from New York be kind enough to state the different substantive propositions?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The rule provides that at 5 o'clock today and 5 o'clock on Thursday of this week the Speaker shall declare the House in recess until 11.30 o'clock the next calendar day. That is one substantive proposition. That at 11.30 on Friday of this week the Chair shall declare the House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the naval appropriation bill. That is the second distinct substantive proposition. That at 5 o'clock on Friday the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall declare the committee in recess until 11.30 on Saturday. That is the third distinct substantive proposition. And at 5 o'clock on Saturday of this week that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall declare the House in recess until 11.30 o'clock on Monday of next week.

Then there is a provision, Mr. Speaker, a distinct substantive provision, that if the general debate shall not be concluded on the naval appropriation bill at 5 o'clock on Saturday of this week, that the Chairman of the committee shall then declare the committee in recess. Now, these are distinct substantive propositions, any one of which being taken from the resolution, other distinct substantive propositions remain. Under this rule of the House, which the Committee on Rules has not yet abrogated, a Member of the House is entitled to demand, before the question is put, that a separate vote be taken upon each substantive proposition in this resolution. Since the majority has exercised the power under the rules of the House to strip the minority of all its rights, some of the minority will insist upon the few rights that are still left under the rules for the rest of this session. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. This resolution is nothing more nor less than a programme of legislative proceedings, and it is absolutely impossible to make any distinction and take away part of it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman does not mean to say that the rules recognize a programme?

Mr. DALZELL. I do.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And to pass any resolution which contains distinct substantive propositions, which, if one were taken away, leaves a distinct substantive proposition?

Mr. DALZELL. It is a substantive proposition for legislative proceedings for the week.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I call the attention of the Chair, if he desires, to the only precedent existing, a ruling of a Speaker, at that time a Republican. It was on a resolution for the adoption of the rules of a previous Congress; the first part of the resolution was held to be one substantive proposition. That very resolution contained other statements, and the Speaker admitted a division of the resolution and separate votes upon each substantive proposition in it.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to discuss this question. If it were not for this rule, that permits forty minutes' debate after the previous question is ordered, no debate would be in order at all. We have but one proposition here, and that is a rule.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if I can have attention for one moment, it seems to me that the gentleman from New York is in error when he thinks there are seven different substantive propositions contained in this resolution. He says that this proposition to take a recess on Friday night is a substantive proposition; that the proposition to take a recess on Saturday night is a substantive proposition. Ah, Mr. Speaker, they all depend each on the other. It would not be possible for the House under the rules, to provide that the Committee of the Whole should take a recess on Friday if we did not include that with the rest of the resolution.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman does not mean that, because the rule provides that the House shall take a recess in two cases and that the House go into Committee of the Whole, and thereafter the Committee of the Whole should take a recess, that these are not distinct propositions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is prepared to rule. On a careful examination of this rule, the Chair finds that there are five substantive propositions and five only, so that if the gentleman demands a separate vote upon either or all of them, a separate vote will be taken.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do so demand a separate vote on each of them.

Mr. MANN. I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the previous question having been ordered, it is not in order to move that.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the motion. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first substantive proposition.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on this day and on Thursday of this week the House shall take a recess at 5 o'clock p. m. until 11.30 a. m. of the next calendar day.

The SPEAKER. As many as are in favor of agreeing to the portion of the resolution just read will say "aye," those opposed "no." [The vote being taken.] The "ayes" seem to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Division!

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, tellers!

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 149, nays 128, answered "present" 7, not voting 103, as follows:

So the first substantive proposition of the resolution was agreed to.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. STURGISS with Mr. SHACKLEFORD.

Mr. KNAPP with Mr. HITCHCOCK.

Mr. MCCREARY with Mr. SPARKMAN.

Mr. MORSE with Mr. STANLEY.

Mr. DRISCOLL with Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina.

Mr. BANNON with Mr. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. HEPBURN with Mr. BARTLETT of Nevada.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, how am I recorded?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recorded.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. I was present and did not hear my name.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr MANN). Was the gentleman in the Chamber and listening when his name should have been called and failed to hear it?

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. I was.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES, and he voted "no," as above recorded.

The result of the vote was then announced, as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next substantive proposition.

The Clerk read as follows:

That on Friday, April 10, at 11.30 a. m., the Speaker shall declare the House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 20471, the naval appropriation bill; that at 5 o'clock p. m. on Friday, April 10, the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall declare the committee in recess until 11.30 a. m. on Saturday, April 11; that at 5 o'clock p. m., Saturday, April 11, the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall declare the committee in recess until 11.30 o'clock a. m. on Monday, April 13.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that on a hasty examination of the substantive proposition the Chair was inclined to be of the opinion that there were four, but on a second and more careful consideration the Chair is of opinion that there are but three substantive propositions.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the Chair will indulge me a moment, not captiously, there is a substantive proposition that the Chair shall declare the House in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of a certain bill. Now, that is a substantive proposition which the House should vote on and determine.

The SPEAKER. Seemingly so, but in fact not so. The Clerk will read the ruling of the Chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Chair, on reexamination of the rule, is inclined to think that there are only three substantive propositions. The Chair is willing to admit that the question is somewhat close and that several clauses may be segregated each of which makes a grammatical proposition, but not a substantial proposition in the sense that it makes a substantive rule for action of the House. Thus, one or two clauses in what may fairly be considered the second portion make, it is true, grammatical propositions, but they do not make substantive propositions within the intent of the resolution, which is to provide a rule of action. Thus those clauses provide for the Committee of the Whole to take a recess, but hardly make a substantive rule without the other clause, which provides that there shall be a Committee of the Whole at the time the recess is to be taken.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Since the Chair deems it a close question, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. MANN. I move to lay that appeal on the table.

Mr. DALZELL. I suggest that the appeal is dilatory.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not dilatory to appeal from a close decision of parliamentary law.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that it is dilatory in substance and in fact.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I deny that the appeal is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the second substantive proposition.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 67, noes 70. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. SULZER. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The point is made that there is no quorum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order that the roll has just been called and disclosed a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of no quorum is made. The doors will be closed, the Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absent Members, the yeas and nays are ordered under the rule, and as many as are in favor of the second substantive proposition will, when their names are called, answer "aye," and those opposed will answer "no;" those present will answer "present." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 148, nays 119, answered "present" 9, not voting 111, as follows:

Mr. REYNOLDS with Mr. SHERWOOD.

Mr. STEPHENS of Minnesota with Mr. CRAIG.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TAWNEY). The Clerk will read the next proposition.

The Clerk read as follows:

That general debate on the naval appropriation bill shall close not later than at 5 o'clock p. m. Saturday, April 11; the time to be equally divided between the majority and minority and controlled by the chairman of the Naval Committee and by the senior member of the majority.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the proposition just read.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 86, noes 73.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that proceeding is dilatory, the Chair having carefully counted the House and there being a decided majority.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the vote is very close.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 146, nays 121, answered "present" 7, not voting 113, as follows:

So the resolution was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. ANDRUS with Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina.

Mr. KAHN (in favor of) with Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN (against).
Mr. CARY with Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES.
The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.
Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the last vote.
The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TAWNEY). Under the roll calls that have been had——
Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, what was the result of the vote?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The last vote was, yeas 146, nays, 121.
Mr. DALZELL. Then, Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion to reconsider is dilatory.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.
Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I hope the Chair will indulge me a moment on the ruling——
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has already decided the motion.
Mr. FITZGERALD. It is the universal practice to move to reconsider a vote by which resolutions are adopted, the rules make it a privileged motion, and——
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chairman has decided——
Mr. FITZGERALD. If the Chair desires to hold that privileged motions are dilatory, let the country know it. I move that the House do now adjourn.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.
Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.
Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that motion is dilatory.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.
Mr. FITZGERALD. That it is a dilatory motion?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. That it is a dilatory motion.
Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it is not a dilatory motion.

WOOD PULP AND PRINT PAPER.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, by unanimous direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, I ask for present consideration of a privileged resolution.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers the following privileged report from the Committee on the Judiciary, which the Clerk will report.
The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary have had under careful consideration House resolution No. 320 and have directed me to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the same be adopted.

The Clerk also read:

Resolution 320.

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to transmit to the House, if not incompatible with the public service, such papers and information as may be in possession of his Department showing what steps, if any, have been taken to investigate the action of the International Paper Company, of New York, and other corporations, joint stock companies, or corporate combinations engaged in the manufacture of wood pulp or print paper or the sale thereof; and what steps have been taken to prosecute the said corporation or corporations, joint stock companies, or combinations for violation of the law in case reasons for such prosecutions may have appeared from investigation, information from the Department of Commerce and Labor, or otherwise.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker——
Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] yield to me?
Mr. JENKINS. How much time does the gentleman from Alabama desire?
Mr. CLAYTON. Five minutes.
Mr. JENKINS. I yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee [Mr. CLAYTON].
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] is recognized for five minutes.
Mr. CLAYTON. This House resolution No. 320 and House resolution No. 321 I may as well speak of together, as they both came from the committee practically at the same time and both relate to the same subject. House resolution No. 320, as the reading discloses, asks the Attorney-General, if not incompatible with the public service, to communicate to the House what investigation, if any, he has made of the alleged criminal trade conspiracy in regard to the manufacture and sale of paper, and what steps, if any, he has taken to prosecute that criminal trade conspiracy if such has been found to exist. The other resolution requires the Bureau of Corporations to report to the House what investigation it has made; in other words, if it has made a diligent investigation into the organization and conduct and management of the business of the International Paper Company, of New York, and other corporations or combinations engaged in the criminal trade conspiracy affecting the paper industry of the country. It requires the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to report the information he has gathered on that, if not incompatible with the public service.
Mr. Speaker, the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary, as well as the minority on this side, demanded substantial relief at the hands of this Congress from this trade conspiracy. Some Members on this side have introduced measures seeking to put wood pulp and other material for the manufacture of paper upon the free list. The majority in control of this House strangled those bills. You have strangled the efforts of the people to get relief from this trade conspiracy [applause on the Democratic side], and instead of relief, the best thing that the minority can exact of you is that when the "Big Stick" in the White House gets busy, and in conjunction with the minority in this House, the Speaker of this House is compelled, himself, to introduce these two resolutions on this important subject. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And instead of getting relief, the proposition is to give us information. I hope these two Departments will give us such information as will prick the conscience of that side of this Chamber, so that the country may be relieved from the oppression of this criminal trade conspiracy. [Applause on the Democratic side.]
Mr. Speaker, these resolutions come from the Committee on the Judiciary with an unanimous report. We on this side give it our hearty approval, and we hope, though we may be disappointed, that these two great Departments in our Government may give us some information, at least, although there is some doubt about that. But I hope the swish of the "big stick," together with the filibuster, if you please, of the minority, may be effective to force the leaders of that side to bring the bills out of the Committee on Ways and Means and into this House, [Applause on the Democratic side.]
I yield the rest of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has half a minute remaining.
Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] to give the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] five minutes.
Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Mississppi [Mr. WILLIAMS] five minutes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]
Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely appreciate the courtesy of extending my time.
This is one of the things that we on this side of the Chamber are emphatically in favor of. This is one of the things to which I referred the other day when I said that as rapidly as you could bring in remedial legislation along these lines we would help you to illustrate how quickly the House could legislate.
But, Mr. Speaker, this resolution itself illustrates how quickly a bill or a resolution sent to a standing committee of this House can come out of it whenever the Speaker of this House is in favor of its coming out. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This resolution was sent to this committee, if I mistake not, some three days ago. It is now before this House for consideration. I dislike to seem ungracious, but in this connection I must read an editorial letter from the New York World, which strikes me as just. It reads as follows:

SPEAKER CANNON'S HUMBUG RESOLUTION.

Does "Uncle Joe" CANNON think that he can play the double part of a stand-pat Speaker and a tariff-revisionist candidate for President without being exposed?

Speaker CANNON'S resolution is very significant.

That is the resolution we are now considering.

He has seen how little the prosecution of manufacturers for entering into illegal combinations affects their power arbitrarily to fix prices, and he favors that harmless method of dealing with them. What he opposes is effective revision of the tariff duties—that afford shelter to the trust. This means that, if when the Republicans eventually undertake to revise the Dingley rates "Uncle Joe" CANNON is Speaker, it is fair to assume that his influence will be used with his Committee on Ways and Means to retain the Dingley duties under which the paper trust and other trusts have so heavily oppressed consumers and other producers.

In an interview upon this subject the Speaker said that he did not see how anybody could contend that a price of paper, which was at a higher level than the expense of production, plus a fair profit, plus the tariff duty, could be produced by the tariff, and yet the reply is very simple. A trust which is formed under the shelter of the tariff has not only the power to raise prices when it wants to exploit consumers, but it has the power to lower prices temporarily whenever it desires to rout an invading adversary. It therefore invariably raises them above the level of the tariff duty when an opportunity to raise is presented. A competitor abroad knows that the moment he starts a shipment, that the moment that shipment gets into the American market, this trust—which has had its birth behind the shelter of the tariff, and could not have it in any other place—will immediately reduce the price to such an extent as to make it unprofitable for him to sell the goods he has exported into the United States. So that all that he can sell is limited to the quantity that he sells by contract at a fixed price and profit before they leave the foreign country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, in his present frame of mind it seems impossible for the gentleman from Mississippi to be just for a single moment. He knows, or ought to know, that a resolution of this class is privileged, and unless the committee reports it in seven days it can be called up. He ought to know that that accounts for the celerity with which this resolution has come from the committee, and he ought not to have insinuated that the Speaker of the House having introduced the resolution that was the reason it came to the House. [Applause on the Republican side.] The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], in a speech he made a month or two ago asserted, and came nearer to demonstrating the proposition than any proposition I ever heard him make before or since, that the price of paper was lower in this country two or three years ago because the Government broke up the paper trust. He produced the dates and the figures. I simply refer to his speech upon that subject. I know that he has been trying to repair it since, but fortunately his speech is in the RECORD and is on record. There is some clamor in this House and outside of it——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield to me for one question?

Mr. PAYNE. I have only five minutes. (Continuing.) For the taking off of the duty on paper and pulp and passing a bill that simply leaves, in case an export duty is put upon logs—pulp logs, coming from Canada—an equal duty on pulp and one-tenth of a cent a pound for each dollar of export duty that is put upon these pulp logs. We are importing now about 9,000 tons of paper from Canada. They are making what they want there, and they export but a trifle anywhere in the world. We produce in this country over 1,000,000 tons of paper, used in printing newspapers. Does anyone suppose by the passing of a bill putting pulp and paper on the free list in the twinkling of an eye you can transfer an industry from the United States to Canada? Or that under those circumstances the Canadian Parliament, which has been agitating this question for several months, and is only kept from imposing an export duty on pulp logs because we have this duty of three-tenths of a cent upon paper, to be increased by one-tenth of a cent for every dollar export duty on logs—does anyone suppose for a moment that the Canadian Parliament will not immediately avail itself of the revenue it would get by putting an export duty of a dollar a cord upon logs; and if they did that, where would you get your relief? Where would you get your cheaper paper? Where, in the name of common sense, would you benefit anybody in this country?

I know there has been some cheap talk about a tax on intelligence. Why did not the gentleman from Mississippi go to his own State and ask the legislature to take the local taxes from newspaper plants, because it is a tax upon intelligence? Why not be consistent? Why not treat these subjects as intelligent men and discuss them as intelligent men, and not go into hysterics over the matter? The difficulty is you feel there are too many votes behind the newspaper people in this country who, under the protection which comes not from the tariff, but from locality, have a monopoly of the newspaper business in the United States, and try to rush Congress into the idea, without investigation, without looking into the facts, without determining whether it would deprive 38,000 people of a means of livelihood, the men who are employed in this paper industry, that they would have us remove the tax, or say they are trying to force us to remove the tax by calling the yeas and nays. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I would like to have just two minutes, and should like the gentleman to yield me five minutes, if he will give me that much.

Mr. JENKINS. I should be very glad to if I could, but I can not.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I am a member of the committee, and would like to be recognized.

Mr. JENKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas one minute.

Mr. MANN. We will give him two minutes if that side will not ask for a roll call.

Mr. JENKINS. I will yield two minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I am not willing that the statement of the gentleman from New York should go to the country unchallenged, because he has "innocently" perverted the facts. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] referred to him the other day as Sir John Falstaff, but it seems that he is now entitled to the cognomen of "Foxy Grandpa" as well. [Laughter.] The truth of the business is that this resolution would not have been privileged for seven days. If it had been submitted by the minority leader from Mississippi it would not have been reported until the end of the seven days, and then only by reason of being privileged. But coming from the Speaker of the House, when it came to the committee, in less than five minutes after it was called to the attention of that committee to-day, upon the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], a Democrat, every member of the committee voted in favor of its report. [Applause.] It was not the fact that it was a privileged resolution that so promptly brought it before this House, but because it was a meritorious resolution and should have been promptly reported to the House, as many other meritorious measures now pending should be reported. The impelling cause of its favorable report was not its privileged character, but the merit of the resolution itself. That is the point of vital concern here. Such are the simple facts, and no committee secrets are betrayed in stating them, and the country is entitled to know the truth. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I want to correct the statement of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], and I also want to correct a statement made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] with reference to the time when this resolution was introduced. It was introduced more than three days ago. The time limit expires to-night, and to-morrow morning both these resolutions would be privileged in this House. I think that disposes of the statement that the committee was governed by reference to what the Speaker had said.

Now, I do not know where the gentleman from Mississippi gets his information as to what the Speaker had said to the committee, but I want simply to say to the gentleman from Mississippi and to the gentlemen on the floor of the House that as chairman of that committee, the Speaker never spoke to me, directly or indirectly, with reference to this matter. [Applause on the Republican side.] I want to say to my very just and able colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Texas, that he knows full well that this resolution followed the usual course in the committee. It was considered briefly a week ago and laid over until to-day. It followed the same course that every privileged resolution in that committee has always followed, that within the time limit it has always been reported out either favorably or unfavorably.

I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. TAWNEY]. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CLAYTON. I hope there will be no demand for a division.

The resolution was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL PAPER COMPANY, OF NEW YORK.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, by unanimous direction of the Committee on the Judiciary I respectfully report a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin reports the following privileged resolution from the Committee on the Judiciary, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be directed, if not incompatible with the public service, to transmit to the House all papers and information which may be in possession of his Department relating to any steps which may have been taken by the Bureau of Corporations to make the "diligent investigation into the organization, conduct, and management of the business" of the International Paper Company, of New York, and other corporations, joint-stock companies, or combinations engaged in the manufacture of wood pulp or print paper or the sale thereof, as said Bureau of Corporations is authorized to do by law of the United States; and all papers and information in his Department which are the result of such investigation, if any such has been made.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up a privileged resolution.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit another privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That during the remainder of this session whenever a general appropriation bill shall have been reported favorably from the Committee of the Whole, it shall be in order to apply to it in the House a motion to suspend the rules under all the conditions prescribed in Rule XXVIII, except that the vote shall be majority instead of two-thirds.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution, like the resolution that preceded it, is to expedite the public business and get rid of this senseless, childish obstruction. [Laughter on the Democratic side; applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. May I ask the gentleman not to debate the question before he calls for the previous question, because he will shut off the twenty minutes' debate and the right to respond to it on this side.

Mr. DALZELL. That is the very object of my speaking. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, I move the previous question.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman from Mississippi has not the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. DALZELL. The House will understand that when a general appropriation bill comes into the House reported from the Committee of the Whole, it is possible to have a roll call on the previous question, it is possible to have a roll call on the engrossment and third reading, upon the motion to recommit and upon its final passage; but that is not all; it is possible to have a roll call on every amendment reported to the House from the Committee of the Whole. So that, for instance, when we bring in the sundry civil bill and it is reported from the committee—comes into the House with fifty or sixty or seventy amendments—if the minority was allowed to carry on their childish antics, we would have fifty or seventy roll calls. The purpose of this resolution is to correct that.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DALZELL. I will.

Mr. MANN. The District of Columbia bill is a concrete illustration reported to the House with various amendments. Under this rule can a motion be made to concur, or will a motion be made to concur in the amendments?

Mr. DALZELL. A motion will be made to suspend the rules and agree to the amendments.

Mr. MANN. Concur in the amendments and pass the bill as amended?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the gentleman asks for the previous question I would like to ask him a question. In the case cited by the gentleman from Illinois, if I understand the rule correctly, there will be no power on the part of the House to secure a separate vote on any particular amendment?

Mr. MANN. Certainly they can, by not agreeing to the motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; by voting down the bill. I understand that unless we vote down the bill we can not get a separate vote on any amendment.

Mr. DALZELL. Yes; the gentleman understands it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the demand for the previous question.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS), there were—ayes 150, noes 128.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

Mr. DALZELL. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that that is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 146, nays 124, answered "present" 12, not voting 105, as follows:

Mr. MURDOCK with Mr. LEGARE.

Mr. NELSON with Mr. POU.

Mr. MORSE with Mr. STANLEY.

The result of the vote was announced as above reported.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 20063) making appropriations for the District of Columbia as amended and reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill, H. R. 20063, with amendments thereto as reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to ask whether or not there will be any opportunity for a separate vote upon any of the amendments.

The SPEAKER. There will not, under this motion. If a majority of the House votes for this motion it passes the District of Columbia appropriation bill with the amendments that were reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I agree with the Speaker; but I wanted it understood.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman has not moved the previous question, and I rose to ask recognition.

Mr. DALZELL. There is no previous question on a motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman demand a division?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, sir.

The House divided and there were—ayes 141, nays 120.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

For balance of this day:

Mr. MUDD with Mr. GILL.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

SUBTREASURY AT ST. LOUIS, MO.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the privileged resolution which I now send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] calls up the following privileged resolution which the Clerk will report.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that you can not call up a resolution that has not been reported.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed it was reported.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What was the point of order?

The SPEAKER. Has the resolution been reported?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It has not. It has been introduced and it is a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman moves to discharge the committee from its further consideration?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I do, sir; to discharge the committee from further consideration and take it up.

Mr. KEIFER. Has the period expired for the report?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] moves to discharge the committee from further consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution 248.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the House of Representatives the following information, if not incompatible with the public interest:

First. Such information, facts, and documents as the investigation by his Department has ascertained or procured as to whether during the year 1906 there was discovered a shortage in the cash, coin, or currency in the subtreasury at St. Louis, Mo., and, if so, what was the amount of such shortage.

Second. Such information, facts, and documents as the investigation by his Department has ascertained or procured as to whether Hon. Thomas J. Akins, assistant United States treasurer in charge of said subtreasury, had given his personal attention to the supervision of said subtreasury, and also the number of days he was absent from said subtreasury during the year 1906 prior to the 1st day of November.

Third. Such information, facts, and documents as the investigation by his Department has ascertained or procured as to whether or not during the year 1906 the said Thomas J. Akins, D. P. Dyer, jr., or M. B. Ferguson had been engaged in speculating in stocks, bonds, grain, cotton, or other commodities, and if so, whether they sustained losses.

Fourth. Whether or not said Secretary of the Treasury has directed action to be commenced on behalf of the Government to recover the amount of such shortage, if any.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. What motion does the gentleman make?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. He can not make that motion; I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes that the motion to lay on the table takes precedence.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Well, but the gentleman has not the floor to make the motion.

Mr. PAYNE. It is a privileged motion, you know.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. A privileged motion is no good when another Member has the floor.

Mr. PAYNE. That is just how you have gotten the floor.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. And having gotten the floor, I have a right to be heard on it. Let the gentleman make his motion in his own time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the impression that the motion to lay on the table takes precedence, even extending to the recognition that is given to the gentleman. The Chair has verified his recollection. Under the rule a motion to discharge the committee is not debatable, and a motion to lay on the table takes precedence. Neither motion is debatable, so far as that is concerned.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 138, noes 123.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I ask for tellers.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order that that is dilatory.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Then, I will ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 126, nays 123, answered "present" 8, not voting 130, as follows:

The following additional pairs were announced:

On this vote:

Mr. LAWRENCE with Mr. RUSSELL of Texas.

Mr. HAYS with Mr. FAVROT.

Mr. FORDNEY with Mr. CRAWFORD.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 126, the nays 123, present 8. The ayes have it, and the motion prevails.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, that seems to be a very close vote. I ask for a recapitulation of the vote.

The SPEAKER. It is a close vote. The gentleman asks that there be a recapitulation. The Clerk will recapitulate the vote.

The vote in the affirmative was recapitulated.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I want to ask if I may at this time call attention to errors in the announcement of those who voted in the affirmative. I desire to challenge the accuracy of that vote.

The SPEAKER. It appears to the Chair after the recapitulation is completed corrections can be made.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Very well.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the recapitulation of the vote.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know how the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] is recorded?

The SPEAKER. In the affirmative.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I make the point of order that he was not present. I also ask how the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CALDERHEAD] is recorded?

The SPEAKER. In the affirmative.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I make the point of order that the gentleman was not present when his name was called, either on the first or second roll call.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear from the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CALDERHEAD] on that.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. They told me I was not present at the first roll call. I was in the corridor, and came in when the second roll call was made. The Clerk may have misunderstood me, but I intended to vote aye.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The gentleman is recorded aye, but I understood he was not present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did vote aye, did he?

Mr. CALDERHEAD. I think so.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman must make a positive statement as to whether he answered or not, when his name was called, under the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The testimony at the desk is that the gentleman voted.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. I voted "aye."

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Then how about the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT]?

The SPEAKER. One moment——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that everybody should sit down. It is impossible to hear what is being said.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that everybody should sit down. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have risen for the purpose of making an inquiry. I wish to ask how the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BOWERS] is recorded.

The SPEAKER. In the negative.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Now I make the point of order that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] was not present at either roll call.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] present? Does any gentleman remember seeing him or hearing him vote?

Mr. WALDO. I saw the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] here only a short time ago. I can not say that I heard him vote.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman see him during the roll call?

Mr. WALDO. I can not say as to that. I saw him here within a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] state that the gentleman [Mr. BARTHOLDT] was not present?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I am informed by those who were keeping some eye on that side that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] was not present during the roll call.

The SPEAKER. That statement is on information and not the gentleman's personal knowledge.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I have not kept him under my eye, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Speaker, I saw the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] pass out of this door only a short time ago, and the best of my judgment is that it was after the roll call had begun.

The SPEAKER. His name ought not to be recorded if he did not vote, but the Chair is reluctant to order the name stricken from the roll unless some gentleman makes a positive statement on the subject.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, the clerk at the cloakroom advises me that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] did vote, and that he then, after voting, remarked that he would now take his hat and coat and go.

The SPEAKER. Who makes that statement?

Mr. FRENCH. The attendant at the cloakroom.

Mr. HAMLIN. In relation to that matter I have this distinct recollection, that the name of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] was called on the second roll call. I did not notice when the roll was first called, but on the second call his name was called, and, knowing his friendship for Mr. Akins, I listened for his vote, but did not hear him vote. Neither did I see him in the hall. That was on the second roll call. He may have voted on the first call, I do not know.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed at the desk that the gentleman was recorded on the first call. With this conflict between the affirmative and negative, and what seems to be hearsay from the Doorkeeper, the Chair does not feel authorized to cause the name to be stricken from the roll. On this vote the ayes are 126, the noes 123. The ayes have it, and the motion prevails.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted:

To Mr. PEARRE, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. WILEY (at the request of Mr. CLAYTON), indefinitely, on account of sickness.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE MEYER.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives shall meet at 2 o'clock p. m., on Sunday, May 10, 1908, for the purpose of having eulogies on the life, character, and public services of the Hon. ADOLPH MEYER, late a Representative in Congress from the First District of Louisiana.

The resolution was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent the reference of the bill S. 3722, to amend section 3 of the act entitled "An act providing for second and additional homestead entries, and for other purposes," approved April 28, 1904, was changed from the Committee on Claims to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I failed to hear the title of the bill which was just sent to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 3722, to amend section 3 of the act entitled "An act providing for second and additional homestead entries, and for other purposes," approved April 28, 1904.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. How does it go to the Committee on Claims?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The Committee on Claims has hundreds of bills before it now and does not appear to be reporting any, and I am loath to have any more bills sent to that committee.

The SPEAKER. The bill is taken from the Committee on Claims and sent to the Committee on the Public Lands; it is relieving the Committee on Claims of the bill.

RECESS.

The SPEAKER. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, in pursuance of the resolution already adopted the Chair declares the House in recess until to-morrow at 11.30 a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Acting Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for salaries of employees, public buildings and grounds (H. Doc. 855)—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service submitting an estimate of appropriation for carrying out the provisions of the act to increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Life-Saving Service (H. ADVERSE REPORTS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, adverse reports were delivered to the Clerk, and laid on the table, as follows:

Mr. BURKE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15018) to restore Second Lieut. Winslow Hart Reaves to the rank and pay of a lieutenant and retire him for physical disability, reported the same adversely, accompanied by a report (No. 1400), which said bill and report were laid on the table.

Mr. SLAYDEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 9339) for the relief of William H. Sloan, reported the same adversely, accompanied by a report (No. 1404), which said bill and report were laid on the table.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 18637) to authorize the appointment of Sergt. John Mahnkin Hall as a second lieutenant on the retired list of the Army, reported the same adversely, accompanied by a report (No. 1413), which said bill and report were laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of bills of the following titles, which were thereupon referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16823) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin F. Horn—Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 9, 1908.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday last, when, on request of Mr. KEAN, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

EXPENDITURES OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, pursuant to law, classified and detailed estimates of every subject of expenditure intended for the Agricultural Department for the next fiscal year, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, pursuant to law, a detailed statement of the expenditures of the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1907, which was read.

Mr. HEYBURN. One set of the papers accompanying this communication is identical with those which were presented by me to the Senate on last Tuesday, and which at that time were ordered printed as a document. This being the case, there will be no necessity for a reprint.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The communication will be printed and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

COMPANIES B, C, AND D, TWENTY-FIFTH INFANTRY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 6th instant, a list of names of enlisted men of the Twenty-fifth Infantry discharged without honor on account of the Brownsville, Tex., shooting affray, who have applied for reenlistment under the order of the Secretary of War, etc., which, on motion of Mr. FORAKER, was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

FINDINGS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of fact filed by the court in the cause of the Church of Christ, of Acworth, Ga., a corporation, successor to the congregation of the Christian Church of Acworth, Ga., claimant, v. United States, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 20063) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

S. 4260. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved June 29, 1906; and

H. R. 18754. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented the petition of John J. Hannahan, grand master of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, in behalf of a meeting of general chairmen held at Chicago April 6, representing thirty-four railroads from the west, northwest, and southwest of Chicago, praying for the enactment of legislation to promote the safety of railroad employees by having adopted a self-dumping ash pan on locomotives, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Commercial and Industrial Association of Selma, Ala., praying that an appropriation of not less than $500,000,000 be made during the next ten years for the improvement of the waterways of the country, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Wisconsin Federation of Women's Clubs; praying for the enactment of legislation providing for an investigation and the development of the methods of the treatment of tuberculosis, which was referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

Mr. KEAN. I present a memorial from the commander and past department commanders of the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of New Jersey. It is very short, and I ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

There being no objection, the memorial was read and referred to the Committee on Pensions, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE DEPARTMENT OF NEW JERSEY,
GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

We, the commander and the past department commanders of the Department of New Jersey, Grand Army of the Republic, most respectfully protest against the passage of a bill now pending in Congress, introduced by the Hon. J. WARREN KEIFER, the object of which is to abolish all the pension agencies throughout the land and consolidate them all in one agency at Washington, D. C.

We feel that the rights, as well as the convenience, of the pensioners, who are the wards of this nation, should be considered. The only reason advanced for the passage of this bill is a matter of economy, and it is a question for debate as to whether or no it is for the purpose of economy or whether it is for the purpose of retaining in the present office in the Pension Bureau at Washington, on a false plea of economy, the high-salaried clerkships, instead of the many low-salaried clerkships in the pension agencies, who do the work.

Yours, most respectfully,

N. M. Nevius, post commander, Department of New Jersey, Grand Army of the Republic; Arthur W. Tench, department commander, Grand Army of the Republic, New Jersey; Ernest C. Stahl, past department commander of New Jersey; E. C. Richards, past department commander of New Jersey; James M. Atwood, past department commander, New Jersey; Samuel Hufty, past department commander, New Jersey; H. L. Hartshorn, past department commander, New Jersey; George Barrett, past department commander, New Jersey; Charles Benson, past department commander and quartermaster-general, Grand Army of the Republic; Samuel G. Hoyter, past department commander; William C. Smith, past department commander; John Lawrence, past department commander.

Mr. KEAN presented a petition of sundry citizens of the State of New Jersey, praying for the passage of the so-called "parcels-post bill," which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Plainfield, Hackensack, and of the Morris County Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, of Morristown, all in the State of New Jersey, praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the employment of child labor, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. GALLINGER presented memorials of sundry citizens of Washington, Nebraska, South Dakota, Oregon, Minnesota, and Idaho, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to protect the first day of the week as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

VOLUNTEER RETIRED LIST ROLL.

Mr. BURROWS. I present a letter from the executive committee of the Volunteer Retired List of the Army, relative to the creation in the War Department of a roll to be known as the "Volunteer retired list roll," together with resolutions of the legislatures of Illinois, Ohio, and New York indorsing the creation of this roll. I move that it be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

ALLEGED STRUCTURAL DEFECTS IN UNITED STATES BATTLE SHIPS.

Mr. HALE. I present a paper (an extract from the Scientific American) on the alleged structural defects in United States battle ships. I move that it be printed in the RECORD, printed as a document, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

There being no objection, the paper was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, ordered to be printed as a document, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Senate hearing on the alleged defects in the vessels of our Navy was held with a view of ascertaining the exact facts regarding the freeboard, position of water line armor, height of guns, and other features of our battle ships as compared with those of the leading foreign navies. The proceedings were very exhaustive, and resulted in the presentation of a vast amount of information, accompanied with detailed plans bearing upon these important points. The people of the United States will be gratified to learn that the evidence which has thus far transpired is not only a complete vindication of the excellence of the ships of our Navy, but it proves them to be, in some respects, decidedly superior to foreign ships of the same date and type.

It was evident from the testimony given by certain seagoing officers who have been active in criticism of our ships, that they indorsed the allegations made in what is known as the Reuterdahl article. Now, the charge made in that article (and it is well to be perfectly clear on this point) was not so much that our ships could be made better than they are (a fact which everybody is prepared to admit), but that our ships are inferior, and greatly inferior, to the ships of foreign navies. It is with this last statement in particular that we have always taken decided issue. The Scientific American claims (and not a word of truth has been adduced to show the contrary) that our battle ships of any given type and date are as efficient as foreign battle ships of the same type and date, and, in respect of their armament, are greatly superior.

The official cross sections of a large number of typical foreign battle ships, which were presented in the recent Senate hearing, prove that this contention is absolutely correct. Compared with the British and Japanese ships our armor belts are as thick, and sometimes thicker; they are in the same position with regard to the water line; our freeboard is as great, and in some cases greater; our broadside guns are carried as high, and generally higher; our rate of ammunition supply is as rapid, and in many ships more rapid; and (greatest surprise of all) the open ammunition hoist to the turrets is not peculiar to our own Navy, but is found in several of the crack battle ships and cruisers of other navies.

That the above comparison is a high testimony to the quality of our ships will be recognized, when we mention that the cross sections cited are of such ships as the British Royal Sovereign, Majestic, King Edward and Dreadnought, and the Japanese Asahi, Mikasa, Kashima, and Aki;" and we may mention just here that even in the case of the two crack battle ships, Mikasa and Asahi, of the Japanese fleet, the broadside guns are only about 12 feet above the water line, as against from 14½ to 15¼ feet on our own ships. So also in the comparison with contemporaneous French ships it is found that the thickness and position of our armor belts is fully as satisfactory; that the armoring of the top sides is greatly superior, and that in respect of the freeboard only and the height at which the guns are carried have the French ships any so-called advantage. That lofty guns and towering top sides have been adopted at the expense of stability is shown by the fact that, with one exception, the French type Russian battle ships which fought in the battle of the Sea of Japan proved their top heaviness by turning turtle and going to the bottom. Furthermore, the one French type ship, the Orel, which was captured by the Japanese, was changed by them to the American type, by cutting down her decks and lowering her gun positions.

According to press dispatches, Rear-Admiral Evans has sent to the Department a report upon the behavior of our ships during the Pacific cruise, in which certain suggestions are made with reference to the questions of armor belts, turrets, freeboard, etc., which are now in debate. The report contains the opinion of a naval constructor detailed especially to watch the behavior of the vessels, and of various seagoing officers in charge of the ships. In due course, when this report becomes available, we hope to give a review of its salient features. According to press dispatches, Naval Constructor Robinson noted that, although, in the main, the voyage was made in quiet weather, the ships at times rolled sufficiently to expose the unarmored bottom below the belt, and hence the suggestion of some of the officers that the belt be made wider is accompanied with the stipulation that the bottom of the belt be left in its present low position. It is suggested that the additional weight due to wider belts be compensated for by the removal of "what is termed superfluous weight." We believe that no small reduction of weight can be made in this way; for it is a notorious fact that our ships carry, in the way of comforts and conveniences for officers and men, much weight that is not to be found in foreign battle ships. It is also stated that Rear-Admiral Evans "recommends taking off the after-bridges," though why he should do this, when it was at his earnest insistence and in opposition to the strong wish of the Construction Department that an extra flying bridge was built aft on the Connecticut for his special use, we are at a loss to understand. Commenting on the suggestion of some of the commanding officers that the belts might be raised from 6 inches to a foot higher (which, by the way, would bring them just where they were designed to be before extra weights were added during construction), Admiral Evans says:

"But even this is open to question, for it has been noted that even when heavily laden and in the smooth to moderate seas which have thus far characterized this cruise the ships frequently expose their entire belt and the bottom plating beneath.

"It must be remembered that even a 5 or a 6 inch shell, of which there would be a great number, could inflict a severe and dangerous injury if it struck below the belt, while otherwise the water line, even with the belt entirely submerged, is, on account of the casemate armor and coal, immune to all except the heaviest projectiles.

"The fact is that under the sea conditions in which battles may be fought a belt of 8 feet in width, if considered alone, is too narrow to afford the desired protection wherever it may be placed, and the question becomes an academic discussion with certain arguments on each side.

"It is understood that on the latest ships this question is of little import, as the citadel armor is but 1 inch less in thickness than on the water line, and for those ships already built it is believed that when the bridges are removed and all weights, which would be landed should war break out, are taken into consideration, the ship will rise to the 6 to 12 inches, which is believed to be the maximum that it could be desired to raise them."

If, as is reported, the Admiral states that the broadside guns "can only be used to advantage when the battle ships are not steaming more than 10 knots," we can only say that bad, indeed, must be the case of the battle ships of other navies, the majority of which carry these guns from 1 to 3 feet nearer the water than do our own ships.

The country is to be congratulated on the fact that the recent wild and baseless criticism of our ships should have been made just when the fleet was starting for the Pacific. In spite of the fact that most of it was either false or grossly exaggerated, it has done an incalculable amount of good; for as a result of the discussion and investigation which has followed, a large amount of information has been made public regarding our ships which scarcely could have become known in any other way. Not only have they now a more intelligent knowledge of our Navy, but the confidence of the people of the United States in the excellence of our ships has been greatly strengthened. As a further indorsement, there has come the brilliant success achieved by Admiral Evans and his officers and men in bringing that fleet through its 14,000-mile trip in perfect order and two days ahead of the schedule time.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6033) to provide for the resurvey of certain townships in Colorado, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report (No. 484) thereon.

Mr. BORAH, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (S. 915) to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors in buildings, ships, navy-yards, and parks and other premises owned or used by the United States Government, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 485) thereon.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 157) providing for the erection of a public building in the city of Hinton, W. Va., reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 486) thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5581) pensioning the surviving officers and enlisted men of the Texas volunteers employed in the defense of the frontier of that State against Mexican marauders and Indian depredations from 1855 to 1860, inclusive, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 487) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 18930) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 488) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred certain bills granting pensions and increase of pensions, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. 6569) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and helpless and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, which was read twice by its title, the bill being a substitute for the following Senate bills heretofore referred to that committee:

Mr. HEYBURN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5945) to provide for the appointment of a commission to select sites for certain public buildings on lands owned by the Government in the city of Washington, and to procure and report to Congress preliminary plans and estimates of cost therefor, submitted an adverse report (No. 489) thereon, which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to make a supplementary report to accompany the bill (S. 122) authorizing the purchase of grounds for the accommodation of public buildings for the use of the Government of the United States in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes. I ask that it be printed as a part of report No. 9, heretofore submitted by me from that committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6447) giving Herman Lehman (Montechema) an allotment, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2734) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Milledgeville, Ga., reported it with amendments, and submitted a report (No. 490) thereon.

Mr. BURKETT, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1933) to provide for the erection of a public building at the city of Plattsmouth, Nebr., reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report (No. 491) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3093) to provide for the enlargement of the present site, or the purchase of a new site, and the erection thereon of a building for subtreasury purposes at San Francisco, in the State of California, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report (No. 492) thereon.

Mr. SIMMONS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 75) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to make a survey and examination for a continuous waterway from Boston, Mass., by various routes to Wilmington, N. C., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report (No. 494) thereon.

Mr. BOURNE, from the Committee on Fisheries, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6335) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Minnesota, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 495) thereon.

Mr. HEYBURN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 16770) granting land to Anna Johnson (Report No. 496); and

A bill (H. R. 17005) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents in fee to the Board of Missions of the Protestant Episcopal Church for certain land in the State of Idaho (Report No. 497).

NATIONAL SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the communication from the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, transmitting the tenth annual report of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution, reported favorably thereon, and moved that the report be printed, which was agreed to.

COMPLETING PEDIMENT OF HOUSE WING OF THE CAPITOL.

Mr. WETMORE. I report back from the Committee on the Library, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 17983) for completing the pediment of the House wing of the Capitol, and I submit a report (No. 483) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the expenditure of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, authorized for the purpose of completing the pediment of the House wing of the Capitol by placing suitable statuary thereon, said expenditure to be made under the direction of the Speaker of the House, the Joint Committee on the Library, and the Superintendent of the Capitol.

Mr. CULBERSON. From what committee does the bill come?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. From the Committee on the Library. It is a House bill.

Mr. WETMORE. I ask that the report be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island asks for the reading of the report. It will be read.

The Secretary read the report this day submitted by Mr. WETMORE, as follows:

Mr. WETMORE, from the Committee on the Library, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 17983):

The Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 17983) for completing the pediment of the House wing of the Capitol, have had the same under consideration, and report it back without amendment.

In reporting this bill favorably on February 26, 1908 (H. Rep. 1090, 60th Cong., 1st sess.), the Committee on the Library of the House of Representatives says:

"The Senate pediment was decorated in 1862 by appropriate groups of allegorical statuary, and it was intended at that time to place on the corresponding pediment above the east portico of the House of Representatives a similar group representative of our history and life, but this intention has never been carried out. The work provided for by the bill is necessary to the completion and beauty of the Capitol building."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT AMERICUS, GA.

Mr. CLAY. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4788) to provide for increasing the limit of cost of the public building authorized to be erected at Americus, Sumter County, Ga., to report it favorably with an amendment, and I submit a report (No. 482) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment was, in line 7, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limit of cost prescribed in the act approved June 30, 1906, for the purchase of a site and the erection of a United States post-office at Americus, Sumter County, Ga., be, and the same is hereby, increased to the sum of $75,000, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to enter into contracts for the completion of the building to be erected upon the site heretofore acquired by the United States for the erection of a United States post-office at Americus, Sumter County, Ga., within the limits herein provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO SATURDAY.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Saturday next.

Mr. CULBERSON rose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I want to suggest to the Senator from Maine that there are important matters on the Calendar which ought to be considered. Among others to which I invite the attention of Senators is the employers' liability bill. It occurs to me that the Senate can very well devote the day suggested for adjournment over to the consideration of that bill, among others.

Mr. HALE. I will say to the Senator that I think an opportunity will be given to the Senate to-day to take up that measure, and quite likely pass it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest then, as is suggested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] in my hearing, that the Senator from Maine might postpone until later in the day the motion to adjourn to Saturday.

Mr. HALE. I am entirely willing to do that. I made the motion at the suggestion of several Senators and in conference with the Senator who is in charge of the unfinished business, and for the convenience of Senators who desire to do work in committees. But I have no objection whatever, Mr. President, to withholding the motion for the present, and we will see what is done during the day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine withholds the motion to adjourn until Saturday.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 6544) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of William H. Atkins, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SMOOT introduced a bill (S. 6545) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Handly, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. du PONT introduced a bill (S. 6546) to correct the military record of Dennis Kane, alias Joseph Warren, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TELLER introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (S. 6547) removing the charge of desertion from the name of Byard Hickman; and

A bill (S. 6548) authorizing the appointment of James Moynahan to the rank and grade of major on the retired list of the United States Army.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 6549) granting an increase of pension to Henry C. Yetter, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KEAN introduced a bill (S. 6550) granting an honorable discharge to Thompson B. Pollard, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 6551) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth B. Eckersley (with an accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 6552) granting an increase of pension to Margaret Thompson; and

A bill (S. 6553) granting an increase of pension to Catherine E. Bennett (with accompanying papers).

Mr. CURTIS introduced a bill (S. 6554) for the erection of a monument to the memory of Brig. Gen. James Shields in St. Mary's Cemetery, Carrollton, Mo., which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. SCOTT introduced a bill (S. 6555) to create in the War Department a roll to be known as the volunteer retired list, to authorize placing thereon with pay certain surviving officers of the United States Volunteer Army of the civil war, and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BURROWS introduced a bill (S. 6556) granting an increase of pension to Henry R. Warren, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DICK introduced a bill (S. 6557) granting an increase of pension to Mary L. Morrow, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6558) to extend the limitation fixed by the act of April 27, 1904, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 6559) for the suppression of usury in the District of Columbia, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 6560) repealing section 2508 of the Revised Statutes, commonly known as the St. John River act, as amended by the act approved February 27, 1877, and the act approved March 16, 1866, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HALE. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and I call the attention of my colleague to it, as it is a very important bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McLAURIN introduced a bill (S. 6561) to require interstate railroad corporations to make certain statements to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. FRAZIER introduced a bill (S. 6562) for the relief of heirs or estate of A. Worley Patterson, which was read twice by its title and, with an accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6563) granting an honorable discharge to John W. Scott, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WETMORE introduced a bill (S. 6564) granting an increase of pension to William A. Champlin, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BURKETT introduced a bill (S. 6565) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of John P. Maxwell and Hugh H. Maxwell, deceased, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CLAY introduced a bill (S. 6566) for the relief of Patrick J. Sullivan, Jeremiah McCarthy, and Bartholomew Shea, and for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of John B. Dillon, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CLAPP introduced a bill (S. 6567) granting an increase of pension to Mary C. Hayes, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SUTHERLAND introduced a bill (S. 6568) granting an increase of pension to James B. Simmons, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. NELSON (for Mr. KITTREDGE) introduced a bill (S. 6570) granting an increase of pension to E. T. C. Lord, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CLAPP introduced a bill (S. 6571) granting an increase of pension to Cyrus Wellington, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FOSTER introduced a bill (S. 6572) to authorize the Ruston, Natchitoches and Northeastern Railroad Company to construct a bridge across Bayou D'Arbonne, in Louisiana, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MARTIN introduced a bill (S. 6573) for the erection of a monument to ex-President John Tyler, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. BOURNE introduced a bill (S. 6574) for the relief of William H. Townsend, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6575) granting a pension to Jennie Hammond, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. PILES submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,500 for the installation of a system of automatic temperature regulation in the court-house, custom-house, and post-office building now under construction in the city of Seattle, Wash, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $4,608,862 for transportation of foreign mail, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. FRAZIER submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. MARTIN submitted four amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that 1,000 additional copies of the bill (S. 6264) to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia be printed for the use of the Document Room. The earlier edition is already exhausted and there are a great many calls for the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMPANIES B, C, AND D, TWENTY-FIFTH INFANTRY.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that next Tuesday, April 14, at the conclusion of the morning business, I will, with the indulgence of the Senate, submit some remarks upon the Brownsville matter, and the legislation that has been proposed in connection therewith.

SUPPRESSION OF ANARCHY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I herewith submit a letter from the Department of Justice which explains itself. Under this opinion, I hold that existing statutes give the President the power to prohibit the Postmaster-General from being used as an instrument in the commission of crime—that is, to prohibit the use of the mails for the advocacy of murder, arson, and treason; and I shall act upon such construction. Unquestionably, however, there should be further legislation by Congress in this matter. When compared with the suppression of anarchy, every other question sinks into insignificance. The anarchist is the enemy of humanity, the enemy of all mankind, and his is a deeper degree of criminality than any other. No immigrant is allowed to come to our shores if he is an anarchist, and no paper published here or abroad should be permitted circulation in this country if it propagates anarchistic opinions.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 9, 1908.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 20063. An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17288) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HULL of Iowa, Mr. PARKER of New Jersey, and Mr. HAY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19355) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SMITH of Iowa, Mr. GRAFF, and Mr. SHERLEY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the Army appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17288) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and grant the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice-President appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. TALIAFERRO as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19355) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. PERKINS. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice-President appointed Mr. PERKINS, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. CLAY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I ask unanimous consent to call up from the table the bill (H. R. 20310) relating to the liability of common carriers by railroad to their employees in certain cases.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Iowa that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement.

Day before yesterday I made a motion to refer the bill, which the Senator from Iowa has now called up for consideration, to the Committee on the Judiciary. I did that for the purpose that at the time I feared there might be some questions involved in the bill on which the Supreme Court would find another ground for pronouncing it to be unconstitutional. Since that time I have carefully examined the bill, and I have come to the conclusion, in my feeble way, that the bill is a good one and a wholesome one, and I do not think that it can be said to violate any provision or principle of the Constitution.

I can see no objection to the bill, and as I am at present advised I shall be glad to see the bill put upon its passage immediately.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota withdraws his motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. NELSON. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. HOPKINS. Which bill is under consideration, the House bill or the bill reported by the Senate committee?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The House bill is the one that is under consideration.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, there is no report accompanying the House bill, and I assume the Senator from Iowa, in charge of the bill, will explain it to the Senate.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I will be very glad to explain the bill briefly.

This bill is intended to correct a defect in a bill on a similar subject passed in the latter days of the last Congress, known as the employers' liability act. On the 6th of January that act was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court upon one main ground, namely, that it undertook to apply its provisions to all common carriers engaged in interstate commerce, regardless of the fact that injuries may often happen to employees of such carriers who are not at the time of the injury engaged in forwarding interstate commerce. The Supreme Court by a decision, in which the court was divided four to five, held that the failure of Congress to separate the employees who are engaged in interstate commerce at the time of the injury from the mass of the employees of the common carrier was sufficient to destroy the validity of the act.

Now, all of the bills which have been introduced in the present Congress have been intended, in good faith, to correct that error in the act of 1906. There is, however, a difference between the House bill, which is now up for consideration, and the bill reported from the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, which is upon the Calendar of the Senate, and if the Senate will bear with me for a moment I will point out the substantial differences between these two measures.

The House bill confines its application entirely to the employees of railways engaged in interstate commerce, whereas the act of 1906 was applicable not only to railways, but to all common carriers engaged in those forms of commerce over which the jurisdiction of Congress extends. The Senate bill reported from the Committee on Education and Labor follows the act of 1906 and covers the employees of all common carriers engaged in those forms of commerce which the power of Congress to regulate commerce reaches. That is the fundamental difference between the pending House bill and the Senate bill which is upon our Calendar.

There is another difference. In the section referring to contributory negligence the Senate bill contains this sentence: "All questions of fact relating to negligence shall be for the jury." That sentence appeared in substance in the act of 1906, although in a crude form. It said, "All questions of negligence shall be for the jury," overlooking the fact that questions of negligence may be questions of law as well as of fact. So I think the Senate bill which is upon the Calendar is an improvement over the act of 1906 in that respect.

I will now briefly state to the Senate exactly what this bill proposes. It contains four substantive propositions.

First, it modifies the old law of the negligence of coemployees. The old law, which took root in the United States two generations ago, was to the effect that an employee injured by the negligence of a fellow-workman could not recover. That was based upon a decision, I understand, rendered by Chief Justice Shaw of the supreme court of Massachusetts as far ago as 1842, a decision which Judge Dillon in an article in the American Law Review says is the fountain head of American jurisprudence on that subject, except in so far as it rests on immemorial precedent.

The proposition was that an employee injured by the negligence of a fellow-workman could not recover. This bill abolishes that doctrine and gives the employee the right to recover for injuries arising from the negligence of his fellow-workman. That is the first proposition.

The second proposition modifies the law whereby in other generations workmen were held by the court to assume the risks arising from defective machinery. That was an inheritance, I reckon, of the common law, and at the time the courts originally established the doctrine it had some sense in it and a little justice. There was some reason why a man working with simple machinery should look to it that the machinery with which he worked was in good order. But that doctrine is obsolete as applied to the present-day occupations of those workmen who are employed by the common carriers of the world. It would require a brakeman to know all about the machinery of a freight train, though it may be half a mile long, as he goes out upon his day's work. Everybody with a moderate sense of justice must see that the common law applicable to the assumption of risks for deficient machinery has no rational application to the complex industrial concerns of our own time.

In the third place, this proposed statute modifies radically the law of contributory negligence. As administered by our courts it has been uniformly held that an employee suffering an injury to which his own negligence contributed can not, by reason of that participation in the injury, have any recovery at law. This proposed statute liberalizes that doctrine of the law. It is based upon the theory that where an injury occurs partly by reason of the negligence of the employer and partly by reason of the negligence of an employee the jury ought to determine what portion of the injury arises from the negligence of the plaintiff and take away from the sum total of his damages allowed that part which can properly be apportioned to his own negligence. That principle has been called in some of the books the "doctrine of comparative negligence."

In the fourth place, this proposed bill undertakes to modify somewhat the common law applicable to certain agreements or contracts made between employers and their workmen in which the latter agree, in consideration of some form of insurance or indemnity fund, to give up the right to sue in the courts. It has been held, as a matter of public policy, that a workman can not contract himself out of his right or the right of his legal representatives to recover for damages. That is to say, the courts have held that it is against public policy to sustain a contract by which a workman merely by consideration of his wages and his employment agrees to withhold any claim for damages in case of his injury. But many insurance societies have grown up in connection with the operation of our railways which not only undertake to repay a man for damages arising out of injuries, but have also certain other features in the nature of sick benefits and other insurance. These have been regarded by the courts as valid and binding agreements.

This proposed law means simply that when a workman sues for injury for which he is entitled to recover he shall not have his recovery defeated by reason of one of these insurance agreements; but it also says that in case the railway has contributed anything to the insurance fund which he has enjoyed the amount that the railway has contributed shall be deducted in the calculation of the damages which he is entitled to recover.

These are the four propositions contained in this bill, and I have an idea that there is not a member of the Senate who does not recognize the equity and justice involved in all four of them.

The fact is we have been at least a generation behind the world in the adoption of the doctrines and principles to which I have referred. Outside of England there has not in modern times been a country in Europe that does not now give its workmen all the advantages that are provided by this bill. There is hardly an American State in these recent years which has not taken this step forward in industrial justice.

The codes of nearly all the countries in Europe were derived, directly or indirectly, from the civil law, and wherever the civil law crossed the water these doctrines which we are introducing into the United States courts in this bill have found acceptance. This is so in the courts of Quebec. The recent English compensation acts illustrate the present-day reaction against the severity of the common law. The fact is that every country in the world has been engaged in the careful study of the relations of its working millions to its prosperity and to its civilization, and this bill proposes to do for workingmen seeking the protection of the courts of the United States what the enlightened jurisprudence of all the modern nations has already done for their workmen under similar conditions.

I will call the attention of the Senate again to the two distinctions which I have referred to between the bill before us and the bill which the Senate committee has proposed. The bill before us has been narrowed so that it is applicable only to railways. The Senate bill which is upon our Calendar leaves the application of the law exactly as it was in the act of 1906, making it cover all common carriers engaged in those forms of commerce over which the jurisdiction of the United States prevails. I intend at the proper moment to move that the Senate bill upon the Calendar be substituted as an amendment for the House bill.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. I want the attention of the Senator from Iowa to two or three things about this bill. This proposed law is similar to the law we have in Georgia fixing the liability of railroads to employees. Now, suppose a train on the Southern Railway engaged in interstate commerce, leaving Atlanta for Washington, and an employee on that train was injured in Georgia—that would be an interstate-commerce trip?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Yes.

Mr. CLAY. Would that employee be compelled to sue in a Federal court in the event of the passage of this act, or could he exercise his option and sue in a State court for the purpose of enforcing his rights?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I think he would be entitled to sue in either forum.

Mr. CLAY. Now, if there were no law fixing the liability in the State courts, in order to sue for the purpose of recovering his rights under this act he would necessarily have to sue in the Federal court, would he not? In other words, this law, if enacted by Congress, fixes the rule of liability for trains engaged in interstate commerce. Now, if an employee desires to avail himself of the provisions of this law, would he not be compelled to sue in a Federal court?

Mr. DOLLIVER. It may be, if he desired the benefits of this law.

Mr. CLAY. But if there is a statute in the State fixing the liability, the Senator thinks the employee can exercise his option to sue either in the Federal or State court?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Possibly so.

Mr. President, I move the substitution of the——

Mr. FORAKER. Before the Senator makes the motion——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. Before the Senator from Iowa closes his remarks, I want to ask him, simply for information—I have had no opportunity, this bill having passed the House only two or three days ago, to read the report which was made in the House in support of the bill—what reason the House gave for limiting the application of this law to carriers by rail, instead of applying it, as we did in the law of 1906, to all interstate carriers, whether by rail or by water or otherwise?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have read, Mr. President, the House report with some curiosity on that question, and I regret to say that nothing appears, so far as I remember, in the report to indicate why the House took that action; but in view of the fact that a question of the constitutionality of the act, because it was made applicable to railways to the exclusion of other interstate carriers, was afterwards raised in the House, I have thought that maybe somebody not particularly interested in the ultimate success of the statute may have secured the limitation measure in that way. Although I do not think that the law is any less constitutional because it is made applicable to railways only, I think it ought to be made applicable to all common carriers over whom we have jurisdiction, because there ought to be uniformity—uniformity along the broad lines of justice.

Mr. BACON and Mr. FORAKER addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Ohio desires to ask the Senator from Iowa a question on that same line, I shall defer what I have to say.

Mr. FORAKER. I do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from Iowa has suggested a very important point in connection with this legislation, and that is, whether or not we render the act unconstitutional by undertaking to classify and make this statute applicable to only one class of carriers; and I was very anxious because of what he suggested to know what view had been taken by the House committee. I suppose it was the Judiciary Committee of the House which reported the bill?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Yes.

Mr. FORAKER. I suppose there is a printed report, and I am a little bit surprised to learn from the Senator's statement that the committee passed over that point in silence. That, I think, is a very important point, and one that we ought to consider very carefully before we agree to the House proposition. Is there nothing in the record which shows that?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I wish to recur to the suggestion made by my colleague [Mr. CLAY] as to the effect of the passage of this proposed law in case of an accident occurring upon an interstate-commerce train. I hope I may have the attention not only of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] but of all the lawyers in this body to the question which I am now about to propound. I presume it will be recognized as an indisputable proposition that, if there is authority to enact this legislation, it is authority derived from the clause of the Constitution which gives to Congress the right to regulate interstate commerce. I understood the Senator from Iowa to say that, in case there was an accident upon a train engaged in interstate commerce, actually at that time engaged in the transportation of interstate commerce, if there were a law of the State prescribing the rules of liability and also this law prescribing the rules of liability, it would be within the discretion or the choice of an employee to avail himself of either the State law or the Federal law. I want to say to the Senator from Iowa that, while I have the very greatest and profoundest respect for his legal learning, I must differ most radically from him on that conclusion.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I undertake to say that he could avail himself of the jurisdiction of the State court or of the United States court, subject, of course, to the right of the defendant to remove the cause to the Federal court under the statutes governing such matters.

Mr. BACON. That was not what I understood to be the question of my colleague. My colleague has stated what is a fact, that the law of the State of Georgia now prescribes, and has for sixty years prescribed, almost the identical rules of liability which are laid down in this House bill.

Mr. DOLLIVER. But, if the Senator from Georgia will permit me, if a citizen of Georgia should sue in the State courts under the law of Georgia it would lie with the defendant to transfer the controversy to the United States court after a proper showing under our judiciary statutes.

Mr. BACON. No; I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. FORAKER rose.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Ohio will pardon me a moment, until I can properly develop the proposition which I was stating.

Mr. FORAKER. I want to ask the Senator from Georgia a question.

Mr. BACON. I shall be ready to answer, or at least to attempt to answer, the question, but I want to make a suggestion to the Senator from Iowa; and I think it is a grave matter which should receive the consideration of the lawyers of this body. I understand the proposition of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] to be that in case there is a State law and a Federal law, if an employee who is injured elects to go into the State court, he will go in for the purpose of having the State law enforced. Am I correct in that?

Mr. DOLLIVER. That is true, if I understand the Senator.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, in that I think the Senator is radically and essentially wrong, for the reason I shall state. My proposition is this—and as a proposition of law I do not think I can possibly be mistaken in it—that whenever the Congress of the United States has the jurisdiction to enact a law for the regulation of interstate commerce, it necessarily nullifies the law of a State passed upon the same subject, and that when you pass this law no law of any State prescribing the rules of liability for an employee engaged in interstate commerce is any longer of any force or effect. That is necessarily so, and whether it can be enforced in a State court or in a Federal court, the law thereafter must be this law and no other law. It can be enforced in either court, but only this law can be enforced. The day it is passed every State law which prescribes a rule of liability for an employee engaged in interstate commerce is annulled, and it is the same as if it had been the repeal of the law of the State.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Our power is exclusive when we act.

Mr. BACON. Absolutely so. There is no doubt about that in the world. It is only a question of jurisdiction to act.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. If we have the jurisdiction to act and do act, the Federal law is supreme, and it nullifies every State law on the subject. Now, I am ready to hear the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. The question I want to ask the Senator is simply this—and I want to ask it only that I may understand him: Has the Senator any doubt that a complainant, anyone having suffered injury, may sue in either the State court or the United States court if the jurisdictional facts exist in his favor? That is to say, if the Senator will allow me to complete the question, suppose a right of action should arise under the State law of Georgia in favor of an employee; could not that employee, if the other party to the suit, the defendant, were a nonresident of Georgia, sue on the ground of diverse citizenship in the United States court as well as in the State court?

Mr. BACON. You mean under the laws that now exist?

Mr. FORAKER. If he should sue in the State court the defendant would, of course, have the right of removal the same as in any other case. So it is as to the right of action arising under this proposed United States statute. If we pass this bill, the suit may be brought in the State courts, or it may be brought in the United States court, or wherever a court may be found that has jurisdiction to entertain such an action.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Only under this law, but not under the State law.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana certainly has spoken without thinking carefully of what he has said. Suppose the right of action should arise under the State law, why should there not be a suit in the United States court if the defendant be a citizen of another State, as a corporation organized outside of Georgia would be? The ground of diverse citizenship would exist.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator did not understand me. I merely said that the right would arise, in case this law were passed, only under this law, and not under the State law, which the Senator from Georgia is entirely accurate in saying would be practically nullified by the passage of this bill, since our power over interstate commerce is exclusive when exercised. For example, to bring out clearly what I mean, suppose we should pass this bill and the State were to pass a law directly to the contrary, it could not exist, because our power, once exercised, is exclusive. If this bill becomes a law, of course the complainant could bring suit either in the State or the Federal court under its provisions, but under its provisions the State law no longer exists, so far as interstate commerce is concerned.

Mr. FORAKER. What may be the effect of a national statute upon a State statute will be for the courts to determine. I apprehend that we are not going to desist from enacting such legislation as we may approve on the ground of its effect upon some legislation that some State may have undertaken to enact. We may have a difference of opinion as to the effect of this legislation. I do not know that we will have; but, whether we have or not, it is immaterial, for if we enact this proposed legislation that will be for the courts to determine. I only wanted that there might be a clear understanding, instead of the confusion that seems to exist as to the right of action under this and as to the court that would take jurisdiction of the question.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Ohio asked me a question without giving me an opportunity to reply, but he went on discussing it.

Mr. FORAKER. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. BACON. Oh, no.

Mr. FORAKER. I sought to interrupt the Senator, but he said he did not want to be interrupted, and I waited until I thought he had concluded.

Mr. BACON. I had no objection to being interrupted.

Mr. FORAKER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BACON. On the contrary, I consented to the Senator's interruption. But, Mr. President, the Senator asked me a question about a matter that I have not contended for. I was not discussing the question as to whether there was a concurrent jurisdiction in the courts. I was discussing the question which I understood to be suggested by the proposition of the Senator from Iowa, whether a man could go into a State court and endeavor to enforce his rights under the State law, or could, at his election, go into the Federal court and attempt to secure his rights under the Federal law. I was not taking issue with the fact that he could go into either court, but my proposition is that, whichever court he went into, there was but one law that he could claim any right under, and that would be the Federal law, because the Federal law, being enacted in pursuance of the authority to regulate interstate commerce, necessarily nullified every State law upon that subject the day that it was passed.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BACON. My colleague [Mr. CLAY] wanted to interrupt me, and I asked him to wait a moment. I now yield to him.

Mr. CLAY. What I want to get clear in my mind is this: My idea was that when this bill should become a law all laws in the States fixing the rule of liability of common carriers engaged in interstate commerce would be superseded by virtue of this law, and whenever an employee proceeds against a railway company for injuries suffered he must look to this statute to fix the rule of liability, and not to statutes of the State. Again, Mr. President, with my colleage's permission, my idea is that if an employee is allowed to sue in the State courts for the purpose of fixing his rights under this proposed law and should attempt to do so, then the railroad unquestionably would have a right to transfer that case to the Federal courts, because the Federal law fixes the rule of liability, and a Federal law is involved. Undoubtedly, therefore, the defendant would have the right to transfer his case to the Federal court.

If we fix a rule of liability by Congress and an injured employee of a railroad company attempts to enforce his rights in the State court thereunder, inasmuch as a Federal statute is involved, I believe the defendant would have the right to transfer the case to the Federal courts. I believe if this law be passed that the employees of the railway companies hereafter must expect to try their cases in the Federal courts, and not in the State courts.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the question which was suggested by the Senator from Georgia has been pretty well settled——

Mr. CLAY. My colleague has the floor, I believe.

Mr. BACON. No; I have yielded the floor.

Mr. CLAY. I thought that my colleague had the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I was simply going to suggest, in answer to the suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia, that the question which was presented by his interrogatory has been pretty well settled by the authorities. If a party is engaged at the time of his injury in interstate commerce, his rights and obligations must undoubtedly be settled by the law which we shall pass. If he should be engaged in State commerce or intrastate commerce, the State law would obtain. In other words, this proposed law would only annul the State law in so far as it affects interstate commerce.

Mr. CLAY. I think the Senator is eminently correct. The statute of Georgia, fixing a liability against railroad companies in favor of employees relating to commerce within the State, would not be changed by the passage of this statute. It would simply affect the employees engaged at the time of the accident in interstate commerce. I do not think there is any question about that.

Mr. BORAH. That is correct; but, then, the question of what court the suit shall be brought in depends upon other propositions, upon the question of diverse citizenship, and the question of whether or not there is a Federal question involved in the controversy. If so, it might be removed, even though the liability is under the State law, or it might be tried by the State court, even though the liability is under the Federal law.

Mr. FORAKER. Simply to avoid any misunderstanding in anything I have said, I want to state that I recognize, as I think everyone here must, that in enacting this legislation there will remain a question for the courts to determine as to how far the Congress can go in regulating the relations of master and servant, employer and employee. I want to say to the Senators who have raised that question that I do not acquiesce in the idea—at least, I am not fully convinced they are right, and I do not see how they can be—that it lies with Congress to say whether a State statute shall be valid or invalid by simply acting or not acting on a particular subject. The power to regulate commerce is conferred on Congress. That is unquestioned, but whether or not the Congress, failing to act, can add to the powers of a State to act on the subject is a question about which there is a great difference of opinion; and that will be one of the questions which will arise and which the courts will have to determine. I do not know of any way by which we can settle it here definitely, in view of our differences of opinion.

Mr. DOLLIVER obtained the floor.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. With the permission of the Senator from Iowa, I will read a paragraph from the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case in which the law enacted in the last Congress was declared void.

> Before coming to consider the contentions concerning the constitutionality of the act, we notice certain suggestions which proceed upon the assumption that they may concern the issue for decision. It is said that the statute inordinately extends the power of Congress and unduly diminishes the legislative authority of the States, since it seeks to exert the power of Congress as to the relation of master and servant, a subject hitherto treated as being exclusively within the control of the States, and that in practice its execution will cripple the State and enlarge the Federal judicial power, since its effect will be to cause every action concerning an injury to a servant employed by a common carrier who may engage in interstate commerce to cease to be a matter of State jurisdiction and to be cognizable in the Federal courts. Moreover, it is said, the statute will create confusion and uncertainty as to the rights of those dwelling within the States, that it will operate injuriously upon all who choose to engage in interstate commerce as a common carrier, since those who so do will become subject to the liability which the statute creates, to be tested by the rules of negligence which the statute embodies, although such rules be unknown to the laws of the several States. Besides, the statute, it is urged, discriminates against all who engage as common carriers in interstate commerce, since it makes them responsible without limit as to the amount to one servant for an injury suffered by the act of a co-servant, even in a case where the negligence of the injured servant has contributed to the result, hence placing all employers who are common carriers in a disfavored and all their employees in a favored class. Indeed, it is insisted the statute proceeds upon contradictory principles, since it imposes the increased responsibility just stated upon the master presumably in order to make him more careful in the selection of his servants, and yet minimizes the necessity for care on the part of the servant by allowing recovery, although he may have been negligent.

But without, even for the sake of argument, conceding the correctness of these suggestions, we at once dismiss them from consideration as concerning merely the expediency of the act and not the power of Congress to enact it. We say this since, in testing the constitutionality of the act, we must confine ourselves to the power to pass it and may not consider evils which it is supposed will arise from the execution of the law, whether they be real or imaginary.

I read this, Mr. President, for the purpose, and only for the purpose, of showing that the question to which the Senators from Georgia have adverted was raised in the Supreme Court of the United States and left undetermined, so far as that case was concerned.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, of course the questions raised by the decision the Senator has read are fundamental; and if those considerations should defeat this proposed legislation, that is one view of it. I do not think they would make any difference. It certainly is no particular hardship for anyone to go into a United States court under a statute like this to enforce statutory rights. I do not know what the ultimate decision of the court would be on the question, if it were presented, of the power of Congress over the relation of master and servant in the States. So far the decisions indicate that, if we confine our jurisdiction to injuries arising in the course of interstate employment, the jurisdiction of Congress over the subject-matter is complete.

I now move that the Senate bill 5307 on the Calendar, as reported by the Committee on Education and Labor, be substituted for the House bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa moves to strike out all after the enacting clause of the House bill and to insert what will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That every common carrier, while engaging in commerce between the several States or between any Territory or Territories and any State or States or with foreign nations, or between the District of Columbia and any State or States or with foreign nations or with any of the possessions of the United States, shall be liable in damages to any person suffering injuries while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce, or in case of the death of such employee, to his or her personal representative, for the benefit of the surviving widow or husband and children of such employee; and, if none, then of such employee's parents; and, if none, then to the next of kin dependent upon such employee, for all such injuries or death resulting in whole or in part from the negligence or mismanagement of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency of its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, works, ships, boats, wharves, or other equipment. That every common carrier in the Territories, the District of Columbia, or the Panama Canal Zone shall be liable in damages to any person suffering injuries while he is employed by such carrier in any of said jurisdictions, or, in case of the death of such employee, to his or her personal representative, for the benefit of the surviving widow or husband and children of such employee; and, if none, then of such employee's parents; and, if none, then of the next of kin dependent upon such employee, for all such injuries or death resulting in whole or in part from the negligence or mismanagement of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, works, ships, boats, wharves, or other equipment.

SEC. 2. That in any action brought against any common carrier under or by virtue of any of the provisions of this act to recover damages for injuries to or the death of any of its employees, the fact that such employee was guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in accordance with the amount of negligence they may find is attributable to such employee: Provided, That no such employee who may be injured or killed shall be held to have been guilty of contributory negligence in any case where the violation of any law for the promotion of the safety of employees by such common carrier contributed to the injury or death of such employee. All questions of fact relating to negligence shall be for the jury to determine.

SEC. 3. That in any action brought against any common carrier under or by virtue of any of the provisions of this act to recover damages for injuries to or the death of any of its employees, such employee shall not be held to have assumed the risk of his employment in any case where the violation of any law for the promotion of the safety of employees by such common carrier contributed to the injury or death of such employee.

SEC. 4. That any contract, rule, regulation, or device whatsoever, the purpose or intent of which shall be to enable any common carrier to exempt itself from any liability created by this act, shall to that extent be void: Provided, That upon the trial of any action brought against any such common carrier under or by virtue of any of the provisions of this act, such common carrier may set off therein any sum it has contributed or paid to any insurance, relief benefit, or indemnity that may have been paid to the injured employee or the person entitled thereto on account of the injury or death for which said action was brought.

SEC. 5. That no action shall be maintained under this act unless commenced within one year from the day the cause of action accrued.

SEC. 6. That the term "common carrier," as used in this act, shall include the receiver or receivers or other persons or corporations charged with the duty of the management and operation of the business of a common carrier.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. Presiednt, I think it is my fault, but I have not had time to read this bill, and I think it is a little unusual to move to substitute a Senate bill for a House bill, especially on a subject of this importance. I am not prepared to say that I approve this bill. I have never heard it read until now, so I do not understand it and do not want to vote on it now. I would prefer, if it is in order, that House bill 20310 be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I do not know in what way to dispose of this bill from a parliamentary standpoint.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I am exceedingly anxious that the Senator from West Virginia should not add an element of comedy to this situation. This bill was originally referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. ELKINS. Which bill?

Mr. DOLLIVER. The employers' liability bill, in the last Congress. It was unloaded by the Judiciary Committee onto the Interstate Commerce Committee, of which my honored friend is chairman, and rested there peaceably for a few months, with nobody reading it, until one morning my honored friend came in here with a motion to unload it back onto the Judiciary Committee. Motions were made to dispose of it otherwise, and finally, in the midst of great trouble, we got a hurried vote on the bill in the closing days of the last Congress.

This bill has been carefully considered by everybody interested in the subject now for three or four years, and I do not desire to appear by silence to acquiesce in the notion that it needs any further treatment by any committee. The bill ought to be passed. Everybody is in favor of it, and all that is necessary is to read it over carefully and vote for it.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I should like to have time to read the bill carefully, and I should like that the vote on the motion be postponed at least until to-morrow. I will not press my motion to refer the House bill to the Judiciary Committee, where I think it belongs.

Mr. DOLLIVER. They solemnly reported to the Senate in the last Congress that the bill did not belong there.

Mr. ELKINS. I object to the present consideration of this bill, if that is in order.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me right there?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will say to the Senator that if he had been in the Senate when the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] was explaining the bill, it seems to me he would not have made this motion in order to procure more time to understand the bill. There are only four propositions involved in it; and they are as clean and open as the king's highway. It does not require any time to understand them nor does it require the Judiciary Committee to interpret them. Anybody who understands the English language can understand the propositions involved in this bill; and it is a waste of the time of the Senate to refer it to a committee. I trust that the Senator in charge of the bill will insist on its present consideration.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, what is the parliamentary situation? Would a motion to refer House bill 20310 get rid of this bill now?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under Rule XXII when a question is pending no motion shall be received but those enumerated in the rule, among which is the motion to recommit. A motion to recommit is in order, but the consideration of the bill can not be postponed by a mere objection.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes.

Mr. FORAKER. I want to say for the benefit of the Senator from West Virginia that I was a member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce when this original proposition was considered there, and I was a member of the Judiciary Committee when, having been sent to that committee, it was considered there. I think this legislation has been as carefully considered as any legislation that has been proposed since I have been a member of the Senate, and I think anyone who voted for the bill we passed in 1906 might vote for this bill without any hesitation whatever.

Mr. ELKINS. You mean the bill offered by the Senator from Iowa—the Senate bill?

Mr. FORAKER. I mean the bill that we enacted into law in 1906, which was recently held by the Supreme Court of the United States to be unconstitutional. It was held to be unconstitutional, so far as the main point was discussed; and the point upon which the decision rested was because it applied to intrastate as well as interstate common carriers. The only difference between the bill as passed by the House and the bill as proposed by the Senator from Iowa having this bill in charge, who offered the substitute, is that the bill as passed by the House was confined in its application to common carriers by rail, to railroads; and the substitute applies to all common carriers, whether by rail, by water, or otherwise. I quite agree that the legislation should be made applicable to all carriers, and I have some curiosity to know why in the House they should have restricted it in the way they did.

When we had under consideration the rate bill—if I may refer to that without any impropriety—Senators will remember that it was my contention all the way through that, whatever legislation on that subject was enacted by Congress, whether constitutional or not, should apply to all carriers, and should not be restricted to any class of carriers; not because I feared it would be unconstitutional if confined to a particular class, because we all know it would not be. The present interstate-commerce act is confined to interstate carriers by rail; it does not apply to water carriers, and yet it has been held to be constitutional. We might confine this bill to one particular class, without, I think, endangering the constitutionality of the law; but, as a matter of principle, as a matter of right, and as a matter of justice, I do not think there should be one rule applied to one class of carriers and a different rule applied to every other class. Therefore I hope the Senator from West Virginia will not make any further objections, but will allow the substitute to be adopted, for I think it is better in that particular, and that is the only difference I could discover, as the Senator read it, between the two bills, except some difference in length. I hope we may pass it.

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator has given this matter a great deal of thought and consideration before the Interstate Commerce Committee and has followed it through its misfortunes and disasters in the Supreme Court of the United States. Will the Senator say that there is no material difference except the one he has stated between the House bill and the bill reported from the Committee on Education and Labor? Is that substantially the same as the House bill?

Mr. FORAKER. They are substantially the same. The Senator has interpolated a word so as to read "negligence or mismanagement." I do not think that the word "mismanagement" adds anything. I suppose the Senator had some good reason for adding it. Whether it does or not, I would not stop to amend by taking it out.

I think there is a far more important question lying behind all this legislation than any such question as that would be, and that is the question whether Congress has the right to regulate the relations between master and servant. If we have a right to regulate those relations in one respect unquestionably we would have the right to regulate them in all respects. If we have a right to say that an employee shall have a right of action against his employer without regard to the question of negligence or contributory negligence, we have a right to say that the common carrier shall pay an engineer $150 a month wages or a brakeman $40 a month, or to do anything else by a statute enacted by Congress that would bear upon the relations of employer and employee.

That, Mr. President, is one great question that lies behind this, and that is a question of supreme importance. I know that the Senator from Iowa appreciates the importance of it. I know that the statute will raise that question. I do not pretend to submit an opinion upon it at this time. I only mean to call attention to the fact that there is a serious question, one which will arise, and because we have avoided in this legislation the point upon which the Supreme Court rested its decision in the other case, it does not follow that this legislation will be constitutional.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ELKINS. I have the floor. I do not see how I got off the floor. I yielded to the Senator from Ohio, and he has just finished.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Then does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ELKINS. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio a question, and then I will yield to the Senator from Utah. Does the bill now under consideration on motion of the Senator from Iowa extend or attempt to extend the liability to all corporations or to carriers by rail?

Mr. FORAKER. The bill as passed by the House applies only to carriers by rail. By the bill the Senator from Iowa offers as a substitute the provision of law will apply to all common carriers engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. ELKINS. Intrastate as well as interstate?

Mr. FORAKER. Oh, no; all common carriers engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The language of the proposed substitute is this: "That every common carrier, while engaging in commerce between the several States," and so forth.

Mr. ELKINS. Let me see that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. ELKINS. I want to understand the bill. I must understand it before I vote on it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have been trying for some time to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from Iowa to the fact that the Senate bill does differ in some essential respects from the House bill in addition to that to which the Senator from Ohio has called attention. The Senator says, as I understand him, that the only difference between the two bills is that the House bill applies to railroads only, while the Senate bill applies to all common carriers of interstate commerce.

Mr. FORAKER. I said the only important difference.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was going to call the Senator's attention to one or two provisions of the bill which differ from the House bill and ask him whether he does not think they are important differences. I followed the reading of the bill as it was read by the Secretary, and perhaps some of the differences escaped me, but some of them I noticed.

Mr. ELKINS. Let me ask the Senator a question right there.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. ELKINS. In my own time I am asking the question, because I yielded to the Senator from Utah. I understand that this bill was introduced by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. Am I right about that?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. So I understand.

Mr. ELKINS. That Senator is not in the Chamber. We are dealing with him, carving him up, administering on him and his assets, and he is looking after the vote of Wisconsin. I am willing he should do that, but I do not think it is proper respect for the Senator from Wisconsin to consider this bill in his absence unless there has been an understanding with him that it should be taken up. If the Senator from Wisconsin has no such understanding, he may have some important amendment or thought to submit on this subject.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator from West Virginia will permit me——

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to conclude.

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator was speaking with my permission.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ELKINS. No; I want the Senator from Utah to finish first.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was about calling the attention of the Senator from Ohio to one or two differences that I noticed in the bills. Section 1, page 2, of the House bill, beginning on line 2, reads:

> For such injury or death resulting in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency.

Now, I call the Senator's attention to this language:

> Or by reason of any defect or insufficiency due to its negligence in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, works, boats, wharves, or other equipment.

In the Senate bill which is offered as a substitute the words——

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is too much confusion in the Chamber.

Mr. TELLER. It is practically impossible to know what is going on in the Chamber. Here is a legal discussion proceeding, and we Senators who do not know much law would like to hear what is being said.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will request Senators to kindly refrain from audible conversation. The Senator from Utah will proceed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In the Senate bill the words "due to its negligence" are entirely omitted.

Mr. BURROWS. Where is the Senator reading?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am reading from page 2 of the House bill, and the same section appears on page 6 of the Senate bill. As I understand that, it makes a very material difference. According to the House bill a carrier can not be held responsible unless the defect or insufficiency in its appliances is due to its negligence. In the Senate bill the carrier may be held responsible, although the defect or insufficiency in the appliances is entirely without its fault. I think we ought to consider a question of that kind.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In just a moment. I ask the Senator from Iowa what reason there was for making that change.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The reason is very plain, Mr. President. We desired to put the workmen of the road in exactly the same legal relation to the carrier that the passengers would have. We simply desired to relieve the workmen of the necessity of proving up that the defective machinery was due to negligence, the insufficiency of machinery being conclusive so far as the claim is concerned. That is the difference between the two bills, but a difference which makes in favor of the workmen.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator may be entirely correct about that, but I was calling attention to it because it does exhibit a very radical difference between the two bills, a difference which it seems to me the Senate should consider carefully before adopting the substitute.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to suggest to the Senator that he incorrectly says the Senator from Iowa is right when he said it would simply put the workman upon the same footing with the passenger. The carrier is not liable to a passenger who is injured by a defect that is latent, with respect to which it has not been guilty of any negligence whatever and concerning which it has exercised that high degree of care which carriers of passengers are required to exercise in supplying themselves with machinery. So I think that ought to be changed.

I want to say that when I remarked there was no substantial difference I did not have the bill before me at that time, and the word "negligence" does occur here in that almost immediate connection. But the Senator is right in saying that it does not apply to deficiencies in machinery due to negligence. I want to correct my statement in that respect.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think that the Senator from Ohio will agree with me that it would not be wise to dispose of a matter like this, which does constitute a very radical difference between the two bills, without due consideration.

Another difference which I observe from a hasty reading of the two bills is in section 4 of the proposed substitute. The language is:

> That in any action brought against any common carrier under or by virtue of any of the provisions of this act to recover damages for injuries to or the death of any of its employees, such employee shall not be held to have assumed the risk of his employment in any case where the violation of any law for the promotion of the safety of employees by such common carrier contributed to the injury or death of such employee.

In this bill the language is:

> Where the violation of any law for the promotion of the safety—

And so forth.

While in the corresponding section of the House bill, occurring on page 3 of the bill, the language is:

> Shall not be held to have assumed the risks of his employment in any case where the violation by such common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of employees.

It seems to me that that might constitute a very radical difference between the two bills. The word "law" certainly has a broader signification than the word "statute." The word "law" in the Senate bill may be held to include common-law principles; and while I am not undertaking to say the one is to be preferred over the other, I am simply calling attention to the fact that the differences are radical and that things of this kind occurring in the two bills admonish us that we ought to proceed with caution and not pass upon this matter hastily. I quite agree with what the Senator from West Virginia says, that we at least ought to postpone the vote upon the measure until to-morrow so that we may be given an opportunity to look into it.

Of course the committees that have had these bills before them have had this opportunity. The committee of which the Senator from Iowa is chairman has had an opportunity of comparing these bills; the Judiciary Committee has had the same opportunity; but those of us who are members of the Senate and not members of those committees have not yet had that opportunity.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I agree entirely with the Senator from Utah. Our duties lead us to the consideration of bills before our respective committees. I confess I never had read this substitute, and I never had heard of it until this morning. I notice that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] introduced a bill coverning ten sections and that every one of them is stricken out, and there is not even an amendment made to the measure he proposed. Every word and line of his bill is stricken out. He is not here to defend his own bill. I think it is only fair to him to wait until he returns to see what he has to say about thus ruthlessly dealing with his bill.

Then another thing, we want to avoid if possible having the Supreme Court of the United States declare the substitute unconstitutional. I see that the word "mismanagement" has crept into the bill. I do not know the effect of that word. I know that there are doubts about it. I have heard doubts just now expressed by good lawyers. I know that some distinguished Democrats who always want to be heard on these questions are absent to-day, and they are good lawyers, and they might enlighten the Senate, as well as the Senator from Wisconsin. I think it is only reasonable in a matter of this importance to allow the bill to go over to-day at least and let us vote on it after we have had a chance to consider it.

The House bill, so far as I can see, seems to be a reasonable bill, free from objection. It has been carefully considered and reported by the House Judiciary Committee. As I understand it, I prefer voting for the House bill, probably with one or two amendments.

I do not say that I would not vote for the Senator's substitute after I have time to read and carefully consider it. I can not understand a bill read from the desk. I can hardly understand the effect of it at all without asking some of the distinguished lawyers of the Senate, because I have been a long way from the law. We have the Senate full of constitutional lawyers. I have been unable to discuss these questions with them. The proper thing to do it seems to me would be to send the House bill to the Judiciary Committee and get a regular report on it, with amendments or without amendment. The Senate then, I think, could vote more intelligently and with a better understanding of the subject. I do not want to vote on a bill, and to vote against it perhaps, that I do not understand; a bill that I have not had time to consider, that I have not read, none of the provisions of which I have studied. I am not prepared to vote on it.

I agree with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. It is not unreasonable, it seems to me, to ask that the bill may go over, and I hope the Senator from Iowa will agree to let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Why?

Mr. ELKINS. Well, in view of all that I have said, and the short notice we have had about the bill. I ask if a motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow would take precedence of his motion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A motion to postpone to a day certain will take precedence of the pending question under Rule XXII.

Mr. ELKINS. I will make that motion now. I move that the bill be postponed until to-morrow. That is a short time. After I read the bill I will have no desire to avoid voting on it, either for or against it.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, this is a bill of very great importance. A bill has come to us from the House which has received the approbation of that body after it was properly considered, and so far as I have been able to see, I think I should prefer the House bill to the Senate bill.

I do not see why there is any particular haste in rushing this bill through to-day. We passed a bill on a former occasion with some enthusiasm and some interest, and the court declared it was absolutely worthless for the purpose for which it was enacted. The court passed, I think, upon the principle of the House bill, although the House bill differs somewhat in some particulars from the bill that we passed June 11, 1906, besides the defects that the court found in that act.

Mr. President, it is not worth while for us to pass a bill here for the purpose of saying to the working people of the country who are interested in this matter that we have passed a bill. Let us pass a bill that will stand the criticism of the court, or else it will be of no benefit to the working people, but a harm.

I doubt whether in an hour or two in the desultory discussion, with the noise and confusion here, you can determine just what ought to be in the bill. If there were any immediate signs of the adjournment of Congress, we might make haste. I think the bill ought to be set down for some day in the immediate future—say, next Monday—and then let it be taken up and discussed.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the House bill. I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa, who has the bill in charge, to the third section of the House bill which came over here, and which is incorporated in the Senate bill.

Mr. ELKINS. Which section is it?

Mr. TELLER. It is the third section, on page 2:

That in all actions hereafter brought against any such common carrier by railroad to recover damages for personal injuries to an employee, or where such injuries have resulted in his death, the fact that the employee may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employee.

Mr. President, to what extent his misconduct contributed is absolutely impracticable and impossible of a proper determination. In this respect the act that we did pass, I think, is very much better. I do not understand why that should not have been followed in both the Senate and the House bills. Section 2 of the act of June 11, 1906, provides:

That in all actions hereafter brought against any common carriers to recover damages for personal injuries to an employee, or where such injuries have resulted in his death, the fact that the employee may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery where his contributory negligence was slight and that of the employer was gross in comparison, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employee.

It is a modification which it seems to me may be very important in the passage of this law. The negligence may be slight; or suppose his negligence contributed absolutely and entirely to the disaster. Does anyone suppose that any court would be willing to administer the law to that extent? It would say, "Well, this man brought it upon himself." But the law says it shall be no bar. The old rule we have adopted in our courts has been that where contributory negligence was slight, even then the courts have recognized the liability of the common carrier. Whether the jury has ever taken it into consideration in diminishing the verdict or not is another question that I do not care to go into. But where there is an absolute negligence on his part that brings about the injury, it seems to me that there he is not entitled to recover. This qualification in the act of 1906 ought to have been put in the bill of this year.

Mr. President, I am anxious to see come out of this bill, whether it be the Senate bill or the House bill, something that will meet the demands that are being made not only by the people, but the demands of justice. I can not quite concede, however, that if a man has brought the disaster on himself and the company have not had any liability in bringing it about he is entitled to recover.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TELLER. In a moment.

I doubt whether we are at liberty to say every time a man goes into the employ of a common carrier that we insure him against accident. I am willing, where the accident does not arise from his misconduct, that the company shall be so treated. Now, I will yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I was just going to suggest to the Senator from Colorado that reading the entire bill will disclose a condition which he suggests could not arise under the act. There must necessarily be in the first instance negligence upon the part of the railroad company or the carrier before any liability exists at all.

Mr. TELLER. The only reason why the Senator is justified in saying that is because the committee used the words "contributory negligence."

Mr. BORAH. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. The act discloses that there is no liability upon the part of the common carrier at any time until the negligence upon the part of the common carrier is first established. Then if it should occur that the employee also contributed to it, the negligence is compared or weighed as between them; but there can not be such a thing as suggested by the Senator, a recovery where the employee was solely and absolutely the one contributing to the injury. There must be in the first instance a liability arising on the part of the employer by reason of negligence.

Mr. TELLER. I do not intend to go into that. That simply shows there is a condition here which ought to be carefully considered in order that we may secure, if possible, the enactment of a law that will stand the test of the courts.

I insist that this is one of the most important laws that has been proposed for a good many years. It has been under discussion for many years, and the courts have gradually extended the liability of the common carriers year after year. Yet there is much of it left in doubt, and the railroad companies have a right to demand of us that we should take this matter up deliberately and carefully and consider it.

It is brought in here this morning, Mr. President. The Senate is in absolute confusion. I have not been able to hear, sitting here nearly in the middle of the Chamber, more than half the discussion that has gone on. One Senator will be on the floor talking, while other Senators will be talking in the neighborhood as loud as he is talking on the floor.

I am not prepared to vote as between the House bill and the Senate bill. I feel like the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I want to have an opportunity to weigh the two measures. We are now brought by the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] squarely to determine whether we will take the House bill or the Senate bill.

I say, as a lawyer of experience, that no man can settle a legal proposition like this in an hour. We ought to have a day fixed, and I am willing to fix the first day the Senate is likely to be in session—next Monday. Then we would have an opportunity between this time and that to sit down and examine and carefully consider the bills, and then we could vote whether we will take the House bill or the Senate bill, or we might find it necessary to add some amendments of our own before we get through with it.

I am in favor of the bill, Mr. President. I expect to vote for it. I voted for the act that was declared unconstitutional. I criticised it, and believed then that it was not a wise provision, but I did not feel like voting against it. I thought possibly the court might say that while it apparently includes commerce that is not within the control of Congress, yet if a case comes before the court which shows that the accident happened in commerce entirely within our jurisdiction, the court might hold that that was sound.

I believe one of the first cases that was determined on this question was determined in the case of the State of Colorado, where the district judge held that we had exceeded our authority, just as the Supreme Court held later. I simply appeal to the Senate that we may have this matter set down for consideration at an early day. If it is necessary to hold a session to-morrow for this purpose, let us hold a session to-morrow.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. CARTER. I inquire of the Senator from Colorado if he has any objection to proceeding with the consideration of the bill to-day? If the consideration is not concluded to-day, it will, of course, be projected in to-morrow's session. I can not at present perceive any real cause for the motion of the Senator from West Virginia, if it pleases other Senators here present to now continue to address themselves to the merits of the measure and the substitute offered for it.

Mr. TELLER. I do not hesitate to say that I feel as a lawyer that I should like a little time to examine these different measures. I shall probably vote for the bill, even if it has any defects in it, if I am compelled to vote; but I should like to satisfy myself, if possible, that the Senate is getting a bill such as we ought to pass.

Mr. CARTER. I submit to the Senator from Colorado that the objection would go to the taking of a vote to-day rather than to the continued consideration of the measure at this time. Other Senators who are present may desire to address the Senate with reference to the bill and the substitute.

Mr. TELLER. I do not desire to interfere with anybody, if Senators want to discuss it, only I say I am not prepared myself to vote on it. I have before me another bill which was committed to the Judiciary Committee. It was introduced by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. I have read that bill, and it seemed to me it was a pretty good bill. I had rather supposed that would be the bill presented to us.

I do not want to reflect on the committee that reported the bill, Mr. President, but if there has been any bill before Congress in ten years that ought to come from the Judiciary Committee, or that at least ought to have the revision and examination of the Judiciary Committee, this is the bill.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. DOLLIVER. This bill or a bill on the same subject was in the last Congress referred to the Judiciary Committee in the lifetime of the late Senator Hoar, and it was reported back to the Senate for another reference on the express ground that the Judiciary Committee had no interest in it or jurisdiction that they desired to exercise in respect to it.

While it is true that the Judiciary Committee is composed of very great lawyers, and that probably one of the greatest lawyers among us has introduced a bill on this subject, yet it is also true that the bill to which my honorable friend has referred is now before the Judiciary Committee and has been for more than three months. I do not desire to do anything to disturb anybody's happiness; I am perfectly willing to abide the order of the Senate, but I feel that it is my duty to ask the Senate to proceed now to the consideration of this bill and get through with it as soon as we can. I should hope we might be able to dispose of it to-day. We have already received four distinct vigorous messages from the President on this subject, and the country is of the opinion that no amount of time would enable us to satisfy our own minds completely as to what ought to be done.

Mr. ELKINS. Let me ask the Senator——

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 415) regulating the settlement of the accounts between the United States and the several States relative to the disposition of the public lands, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. GAMBLE. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. BACON. Does that require unanimous consent?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business can be laid aside by unanimous consent or upon motion.

Mr. BACON. I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia demands the regular order.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill known as the employers' liability bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated.

Mr. NELSON. The House bill or the Senate bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The House bill. The Secretary will state the title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 20310) relating to the liability of common carriers by railroad to their employees in certain cases.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, there has been a question raised here to-day that I think requires some consideration. By this bill do we practically nullify the State laws on this subject? I heard a Senator say that there is no doubt about it. If that is so, Mr. President, it is of still greater concern that we should give the bill careful attention. I am not quite certain that we shall nullify the State laws. I believe that the State I in part represent here has a good law on the subject, a better law, I think, than this is, and we have so far had no trouble about it. I think that is a thing to be considered before we vote for this bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me a moment?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly; I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I think the remarks of the Senator from Colorado are very pertinent. There are some few of us here who do not pretend to know very much about the Constitution, and we have to take advice from those we have confidence in who are learned in the law. For myself, while I am heartily in favor of this bill or some other bill covering the same ground, I should like to have an opportunity to present it to friends who are learned in the law and ask their opinion as to the extent of the bill and the effect it would have on the different States, and also the effect that they think it would have if it should come before the Supreme Court. While I have no objection to the discussion to-day, I should like the vote to go over until some future day, so that those of us who, as I said, are no lawyers may have time to investigate it.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I understand the bill is before the Senate, and I suppose if the Senator who has it in charge insists upon a vote, we shall have to vote on it to-day. As far as I am concerned, I am not prepared to vote on it, although I shall vote if I have to do so.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Iowa is about to offer or has offered the Senate bill as a substitute for the House bill. Am I correct?

Mr. DOLLIVER. That is correct.

Mr. NELSON. That being the case, I want to call the Senator's attention just a moment to one feature of the Senate bill which I think is open to the same constitutional objection that invalidated the law we passed in 1906. The Senate bill provides—

That every common carrier, while engaged in commerce, etc., shall be liable in damages to any person suffering injuries while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce.

That does not specify from what cause or in what manner. If, while a man is employed in interstate commerce, he suffers any injury or is killed by any cause, it makes the company liable. Now, the House bill is very clear and specific on this point. It makes it strictly within the law. This is the language of the House bill:

For such injury—

Speaking of the liability——

Mr. HOPKINS. What line?

Mr. NELSON. Commencing in line 2, page 2:

For such injury or death resulting in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency due to its negligence in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, works, boats, wharves, or other equipment.

Now, that is perfectly clear and within constitutional and legal limits, but the Senate bill covers any injury that may happen to an employee while engaged in the service, no matter from what cause.

The point I desire to make is this, and I think it is apparent to Senators: The act of 1906 was held unconstitutional because we covered too much ground in that case; because we covered interstate and State commerce. This section of the Senate bill is liable in principle to the same objection, because it covers too much ground. It not only covers injuries received from negligence or from defective machinery or defective roadbed, but it covers every case of injury that may happen to anybody in the service from any cause whatsoever.

Now, may not the court do as they did in that other case and say this covers all kinds of injuries? May not the court apply the same argument they did in the former law, and say this covers much more than it is within the jurisdiction of Congress to enact, and hence on that ground we can not separate what is legal and constitutional from what is illegal and unconstitutional, and therefore the act is not legal?

To my mind the House bill is carefully guarded. I have examined it carefully and I think it is a perfectly safe bill. I believe it would be a great mistake and involve the legislation in jeopardy to pass the first section of the Senate bill.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I may not comprehend exactly what the Senator from Minnesota says, but my understanding is that the Supreme Court invalidated the act of 1906 because it undertook to deal with all the employees of an interstate carrier rather than to confine its application to those employees of carriers engaged in interstate commerce, who are actually engaged in forwarding such commerce.

That was the only point the Supreme Court decided. The jurisdiction of Congress to establish this law of negligence was not disputed in the court. The Senate bill obviously overcomes the criticism of the Supreme Court, because it confines this proposed jurisdiction to the employees of interstate commerce carriers while they are in such commerce. That was the point the Supreme Court made, as I understand it.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I am working under pressure the best I know how to read this Dolliver substitute as it is named. I do not mean any disrespect to the distinguished junior Senator from Iowa when I call it the Dolliver substitute. But if I had to vote on these two propositions right now I would take the House bill as the better measure. However, I see that the Senator has followed the House bill in section 3, I think, literally, or almost so. I will read from his bill:

That in any action brought against any common carrier under or by virtue of any of the provisions of this act to recover damages for injuries to or the death of any of its employees, the fact that such employee was guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in accordance with the amount of negligence they may find is attributable to such employee.

The language seems to be identical or substantially the same in the two bills. It appears to me that two employees by slight negligence might bring on an accident that would kill 50 or 100 passengers; they would contribute the negligence that produced the accident and they would recover for their own negligence. That is absolutely true, if I understand the bill, and we do not want to pass such a bill. It is almost putting a premium upon a conspiracy among employees to be guilty of negligence that they can take advantage of their own negligence and kill a hundred people besides. That is the effect of the bill. I do not know whether you can escape the Supreme Court——

Mr. DOLLIVER. The Senator from West Virginia——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The Senator from West Virginia says the two provisions are the same in that particular.

Mr. ELKINS. Substantially.

Mr. DOLLIVER. He has already announced his desire to vote for the House bill.

Mr. ELKINS. I say the defects are the same, and there are a great many other objections I can find. I am not prepared to agree with the junior Senator that public opinion has crystallized around his substitute. I never heard of it until to-day. I do not know how public opinion has had a chance to get at his ideas and views. Where do you get this public opinion; from newspaper clippings, or where?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I am sorry that my friend has preoccupations that have prevented him from observing the course of opinions here. These bills have been pending a long time. I certainly do not want to press anybody to decide a thing that he is not prepared to decide; but I respectfully say that this matter has been pending here long enough to give everybody a general prejudice either for or against the measure, and that we ought to dispose of it.

Mr. ELKINS. I want to say to the Senator frankly that I have been expecting, as I think a number of Senators have, that a bill drawn by the Judiciary Committee and probably by the distinguished junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] would be before the Senate to be considered along with all these bills. Somehow or other it has not been here. We have been looking forward to seeing that bill before the Senate. I think we need some public statement about this whole question, following the decision of the Supreme Court. We have looked to that Senator for guidance as to how to avoid the action of the Supreme Court in the future in declaring the act unconstitutional.

Now, the Senator from Iowa has not reflected public opinion as to his particular bill by saying that it has been before Congress for three or four years. I admit that, but in the form that the Senator has submitted it I do not think there is any public opinion about it yet. The Senator does not answer—I wish he would, because he is a distinguished lawyer—the point I made about negligence by employees, that they may bring on a disaster that may lose one hundred lives.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

Mr. ELKINS. Wait a minute. I want to get this correctly in your mind. Those two employees may have contributed this negligence, each 50 per cent, which is 100 per cent, the whole cause of the disaster and they may sue for damages. Now, am I right or not in that.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do not think the Senator states the case which is applicable to any circumstances that could possibly arise in the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have been looking section 3 over carefully——

Mr. ELKINS. That is the one I am talking about.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It suggests the very anomalous situation that a passenger pays his fare, and if he contributes to his own injury he can not recover, while two employees paid to conduct him safely may by their negligence cause an accident and kill many persons, and yet they can recover. I think the employees of railroad companies are skillful and painstaking, that they are selected with great care, and should be fully protected in their hazardous employment as far as we are able to do so within the limits of the Constitution, and in justice to the carrier we should, however, avoid the judicial pitfall into which we fell in our last effort to relieve them.

Mr. ELKINS. That is the point I have made, and I have asked the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] to answer it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Congress undoubtedly has made up its mind to enact some legislation upon this subject, as we did two years ago, and it ought to do so with care, and it ought to enact a bill that will meet the situation fairly and stand the test of the courts. Otherwise it would reflect seriously upon the legal intelligence of this body and benefit no one. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa whether the passage of this bill will facilitate interstate commerce?

Mr. DOLLIVER. It is intended to promote the rights of the employees of interstate carriers.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That was not my question. The question was whether the passage of this bill will facilitate transportation and interstate commerce, or whether our failure to pass the bill would impede, obstruct, or hinder the movement of interstate commerce. If those two questions are answered in the negative and the bill deals with persons and not with commerce, where, I ask the Senator from Iowa, is the constitutional warrant for this legislation?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, those exact questions are involved in the act of 1906. Its constitutionality was disputed in the Supreme Court by seven of the most famous lawyers in our country, and the suggestion to which my friend refers was not thought of importance enough to appear in their briefs.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It may not be important at all, and therefore if the Senator from Iowa dismisses both of them——

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator from Iowa dismisses both of my questions as unimportant, and the courts should consider the action of Congress in the light of contemporaneous debate upon this measure, I fear our action to-day may be futile and profitless to the vast army of trainmen in whose interest we are attempting to legislate.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I am unwilling to have the intelligence of Congress disparaged by a constant reference to this decision of the court. The act of 1906 was well considered by the great lawyers over whom the honorable Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] presided on the Committee on Interstate Commerce. The fact that the Supreme Court found it defective is no disparagement to Congress. It simply illustrates the difficulty and intricacy of the subject when fine-spun Constitutional limitations are debated. Five of the great judges of the Supreme Court stood against the constitutionality of that act and four equally famous in jurisprudence stood squarely and firmly in favor of its constitutionality in every particular. So it is not a reproach to Congress that we finally agreed upon a bill that divided that great tribunal in so nearly equal numbers.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Now, Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not desire to be placed in a wrong light in regard to this matter. I voted for the bill which the House passed two years ago on this subject, and I think that we may very appropriately legislate upon this subject now; but we ought to legislate upon it appropriately. We are by this act abolishing the principle of contributory negligence and the principle of fellow-servant by one stroke of the pen. We are practically guaranteeing by a system of legal insurance employment in hazardous occupations. That being the situation, we ought to approach it carefully and deliberately, and when finally agreed upon the form of the legislation let it be simple, plain, direct, and effective for all the purposes for which it is intended, and entirely within the limits of the Constitution.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. ELKINS. As I understand it, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] interrupted me to obtain permission to ask a question. Is that the situation before the Senate? Is this my time, Mr. President, and am I on the floor? [Laughter.] I do not object. I should like to hear the argument of the Senator from Michigan, but other Senators desire to ask questions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is under the impression that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] has the floor.

Mr. DOLLIVER. That being so, I desire to submit a few remarks.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I simply wish to say, if the Senator will permit me, that I understood I was properly recognized for the purpose of interrupting the Senator from Iowa.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If so, I do not wish to pursue the matter except to set myself right with the Presiding Officer and the Senator from Iowa, who yielded to me for a question.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I yield very gladly to the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa yields to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. ELKINS. I should like to say to the Senator that I thought I was making a speech.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. ELKINS. I do not believe I have heard an explicit answer to the question I proposed, and I should like to have the benefit of the legal opinion of the Senator from Iowa on it; that is to say, where the employees of a railroad are guilty of negligence—it may be slight, but it may be such negligence that they contribute that would bring on an accident and kill fifty passengers—does not this bill authorize them to sue upon their own negligence and recover? Now, say "yes" or "no."

Mr. DOLLIVER. No.

Mr. ELKINS. I have not as much respect for the Senator's legal opinion as I had before.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The trouble, Mr. President, is that the Senator is dealing with a question of fact. It has often been stated here that we are doing a revolutionary, a radical, and a destructive thing in abolishing the law of fellow-servants and the law of contributory negligence. The facts are that we are simply bringing our jurisprudence up to the liberal interpretations that have prevailed all over the world and that now prevail in the admiralty courts of the United States.

The Supreme Court itself, in the case called the Max Morris case, where a sailor sued a shipowner for damages occasioned by his falling down into a hatchway which was unguarded, had exactly this question of contributory negligence before it. In deciding the case the court pointed out the fact that from time immemorial it had been the maritime law that in case of an accident of that sort the parties should bear the results of the injuries in proportion to the negligence which they had contributed to it. The case is interesting because the Supreme Court, instead of dealing with that doctrine as a revolutionary and destructive thing, took occasion to say, quoting from the district judge and approving his words:

> As stated by the district judge in his opinion in the present case, the more equal distribution of justice, the dictates of humanity, the safety of life and limb, and the public good, will be best promoted by holding vessels liable to bear some part of the actual pecuniary loss sustained by the libellant, in a case like the present, where their fault is clear, provided the libellant's fault, though evident, is neither willful, nor gross, nor inexcusable, and where the other circumstances present a strong case for his relief. (137 U. S., p. 1.)

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have not read the case referred to by the Senator from Iowa, but I venture the prediction that it is not out of the ordinary run of decisions; that somewhere in the case it was laid down specifically that the master was present, giving personal attention to the direction of affairs, and that, being present, there was a higher degree of legal responsibility than there otherwise would have been.

Mr. DOLLIVER. No; it was a case——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. A man can not under the common law run into an open hatchway with his eyes in his head and recover for any injury he may sustain. That is an impossibility. But if the master is present and tells him the way is safe, that is a vastly different proposition, and instantly reverses the ordinary rule of responsibilty, as it should do, in justice to the employee.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] that, as I understand the admiralty law, it is altogether different from what he contends for. The rule of admiralty law is this, as it has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States: That if an injury occurs on board ship, or one which has relation to the courts of admiralty, the court divides the damage between the ship and the person who received the injury. It is not necessary that the master should have seen the accident; that he should have stood there, or that anyone representing the master of the ship was present. If the hold of the ship is left open, and a seaman on board that ship, through his own negligence, in the absence of the master, carelessly passes along the deck and falls into an unlighted hold or hatchway, he can recover damages against the ship in an action in rem for whatever he may be entitled to, deducting therefrom, as the court will, the amount that the court thinks should be deducted by reason of his own negligence. In other words, the court will find in an admiralty case, under the circumstances I have stated, and altogether in the absence of the master, the amount of damages the complainant or libelant is entitled to. If it be $10,000, and the court finds that one-half of that was the result of the libelant's own negligence and the other half was the result of the negligence of the ship, its master or mate, then, on account of his own contributory negligence in the case, the court would deduct $5,000 from the amount which the libelant otherwise would be entitled to recover. It does not necessitate the presence of anyone on board the ship, representing the ship, directing him to go into it to entitle him to recover.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not say that it did. That was not my proposition at all. The Senator is speaking of comparative negligence and the equitable distribution of responsibility in admiralty. I was speaking of the common-law rule.

Mr. PILES. Then I clearly misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I desire simply to call attention to something that is common to both of these bills that seems to require consideration. In line 9, in the House bill—I particularly desire the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill—the word "while" is used. It of course relates entirely to time. The same word is used in the Senate bill on page 6, line 9, and is also used relating entirely to time. It is my intention to propose an amendment by inserting, after the word "injuries," the words "in the course of such employment;" otherwise, if a person was engaged in interstate commerce, an employee of the medium of interstate commerce, were assaulted by an outside person or his injuries should occur during the time the word "while" would apply to him. Of course it is obvious that the committee in both the House and the Senate intended that the injury should result from the employment, and not the injuries that might result from some cause entirely outside of the employment. In other words, it was not intended that the employer should insure the safety of the employee against outside attack or the result of injuries from some cause not included in the employment. I think the insertion, after the word "injury," of the words "in the course of such employment" might be sufficiently comprehensive.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK of Wyoming in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the latter part of that section, which I think is a limitation upon the entire section. It is as follows:

> For such injury or death resulting in whole or in part——

Mr. HEYBURN. From what page is the Senator reading?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am reading from the House bill, page 2, line 2—

> for such injury or death resulting in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier.

That clause which provides that the carrier shall be liable for the negligence of its officers, and so on, is a limitation upon the entire section, as I understand.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it seems to me that the words of that portion of the section the Senator considers a limitation applying to the word "while" are scarcely definite enough to meet the necessities of protecting the employer against liability for injury not occurring because of the employment or in the course of the employment. The words of limitation are indefinite, and they are not directed for a moment to the portion of the section to which I have suggested the amendment. I will read the first section, leaving out the description of the parties for whose benefit the suit may be maintained. It would read this way:

> That every common carrier by railroad while engaging in commerce between any of the several States or Territories, or between any of the States and Territories, or between the District of Columbia and any of the States or Territories, or between the District of Columbia or any of the States or Territories and any foreign nation or nations, shall be liable in damages to any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce.

I will omit the designation of those who may maintain the action. Then follows:

> For such injury or death resulting in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency, due to its negligence, in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, works, boats, wharves, or other equipment.

The words of limitation to which the Senator directs my attention apply only to the acts of the employer and to the things being done by the employer. They are not broad enough to cover the suggestion which I have made, which would be covered by the words relating to the injured party. The language is not broad enough to cover the case of the injured party. It certainly could do no harm to make it more definite by inserting the words "that the injury must be in the course of his employment." That refers to the party injured, and the words of limitation apply only to the employer.

I merely suggest that for the careful consideration of the Senator in charge of the bill. The criticism is applicable both to the House bill and to the Senate bill. They are both defective in that particular.

While I am on my feet, I desire to make another suggestion. There is a great public demand for legislation by Congress upon this subject, but the public does not seem to be advised of the fact that they are, as has been suggested by the Senator from Indiana, substituting Federal legislation for the legislation of their own States. So far as any act that Congress may pass is concerned, it will be exclusive of the right to legislate by any State upon that subject.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So far as the interstate traffic is concerned.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I am referring to the subject under consideration. So that when we legislate, from that time on whatever rights and remedies that are provided for by this bill must be enforced in the United States courts, and not in the State courts.

That probably does not seem a very serious statement to those Senators who live in thickly settled communities where distances are not great, but in the States on the Pacific coast a person may be injured at a point 500 miles distant from the place where a Federal court sits. For example, at present about 4,000 men are working in a certain portion of Idaho in our vicinity, many of them in connection with the railroads. Practically all of them are interstate railroads. We will say a man is injured at the town of Mullan, which is close to the line between Montana and Washington. As the trains come down that enormous grade a man is injured. That road is engaged in interstate commerce.

There can be no question about it, because it practically crosses the line between those two States with those great trains that are run upon the Northern Pacific Railroad. That injured man, in order to enforce his rights against the railroad company, must go to either Moscow, Idaho, or to Boise, or to Pocatello. Moscow is probably 125 miles away. I think that is the mileage allowed to officers. In order to get there from Mullan you pass out of Idaho into the State of Washington and back again into the State of Idaho farther south. Going to Boise it is 515 miles, and going to Pocatello it would be close to a thousand miles.

It is a very serious question as to the wisdom of this legislation. I am not going to oppose it further than to indicate—so that it may go out with the enactment of this bill—that it is not an unmixed blessing.

A personal-injury suit against the railroad company at Mullan would be tried almost within sight of where the injury occurred, at comparatively no expense to the complainant for witnesses or the other ordinary sources of expense; and when those people realize—and I am only using that community to illustrate the conditions—when they realize that their right to prosecute an action for damages in the State court has been taken away by this act of Congress, they may say, "Why did not those to whom we intrusted the duty of legislating for us or of protecting our rights see to this when this legislation was proposed?" I do not propose that it shall go out that we did not see the danger.

Mr. BEVERIDGE and Mr. BURKETT addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], as he first asked me to do so.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I merely want to ask the Senator what employers' liability law his State has. If his State has none and there are many States that have none, the passage of his bill and its enactment into law would furnish for the employees engaged in interstate commerce a law on this subject. The Senator is absolutely right, of course, when he says it is exclusive.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I will yield to the Senator from Nebraska in a moment.

All it would do in our State would be that it would furnish a new rule of evidence. That would be the limit of the operation of this law. I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, it seems to me that the objection the Senator is trying to press to this bill is more imaginary than real. For at least eight or ten years this sort of legislation has been sought and undoubtedly those who have had opportunities for securing damages have given this particular subject attention. Does the Senator know of anybody out in his State interested in this kind of legislation who is objecting on account of the long distances that they might have to travel to reach a court?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not know who will next be injured in the State of Idaho.

Mr. BURKETT. The Senator knows who is working for this legislation, does he not?

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, Mr. President, if it is the intention of the Senator from Nebraska to throw out the idea that I am opposing legislation upon this subject by Congress, then he is far afield. I am not only not opposing it, but I think it is the duty of those who legislate upon questions of this kind to engage in such public consideration of the measure that all the people of all the country may know the thoughts that actuated members of the Senate in their legislative action and that it may not appear to have been adopted merely in response to an edict or a demand of some person, power, potentate, or constituency.

Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, it is my intention to vote for a proper bill upon this subject on my judgment and my responsibility as a Senator in this body, but I am not prepared merely to take something that is handed to me with the statement, "We have sat up all night preparing this for you; it is all right; vote for it." I entered into no such obligation when I stood at the Vice-President's desk upon my entrance into this body, and my duties have not changed since that time. I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the senior Senator from Idaho yield to the junior Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. BORAH. I simply want to ask the Senator a question on a matter of law for information, as I am considerably interested in the proposition suggested by my colleague. Do I understand that the Senator is of the opinion that, in case a corporation engaged in interstate commerce was a resident of the State of Idaho and that the employee was a resident of the State of Idaho, he would still have to go to the Federal courts?

Mr. HEYBURN. If we enact this bill, and enact it because we have control over the corporation in this particular respect, under the Constitution of the United States it is exclusive of legislation upon the same subject by any State.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with my colleague upon that proposition, but why would the jurisdiction to enforce the law be taken away from the State courts?

Mr. HEYBURN. It would be in the United States courts.

Mr. BORAH. That would depend entirely upon the question of whether there was diverse citizenship.

Mr. HEYBURN. It would depend upon whether or not the question was one of Federal character; in other words, whether it was a question arising under the laws or the Constitution of the United States within the language of the judiciary act.

It is not worth while to overlook that question, because we are going to put the State courts out of business very largely so far as the prosecution of this class of cases is concerned, and we want to do it carefully. It is clear that the State courts would have no jurisdiction to hear and determine a case that arises because of the act of Congress. The Federal courts would have jurisdiction of it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. A State court would have jurisdiction, too, but the case could be removed upon application of either party.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is merely another way of stating the fact that it is Federal jurisdiction.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the senior Senator from Idaho yield to the junior Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BORAH. If the State court has jurisdiction in the matter, it could enforce the Federal law just the same as if it were a Federal court. Then as to whether or not it had jurisdiction would depend upon the question of citizenship or the proposition being a Federal question, and if the statute had been construed there, under the authorities there would no longer be any Federal question.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, under the law governing the removal of cases there is not a particle of room for doubt but that any case arising under the provisions of this law involving a jurisdictional amount might be removed to the United States court upon the motion of the party sued, which would be the railroad company of course, because the bill applies only to common carriers by rail. There is no question about that at all.

There are two grounds upon which a case may be removed. One is diverse citizenship, and the other is that it necessarily depends upon the interpretation of a law of Congress or of the Constitution. We have all had too much practice in the removal of causes to Federal courts to be in doubt in regard to that question. So the defendant would always remove the case to the United States court, in order to make it burdensome to the litigant.

I do not intend to be put in the position of an antagonist to this legislation at all. It is my privilege, and I conceive it to be my duty, to explain my understanding of this bill before I vote upon it, and then what I say will go out with my vote. When this bill is in such shape as would seem to accomplish the purpose, I will vote for it. I am not here as an antagonist of it. I think it should be amended so as to remove any possible doubt in the regard that I first mentioned, because, as I pointed out, the language is not sufficiently broad to make it applicable alike to the employer and the employee, and the insertion of those words will remove that possible doubt.

I merely wanted to send out to the people this message, that they were not getting an unmixed blessing in this class of legislation. The jury is given the right to weigh the negligence of the plaintiff against the injury, and as has been suggested to me, the jury may find that the negligence outweighs the injury. That remedy still remains under the provisions both of the House bill and the Senate bill. Under this bill it is a question of comparative negligence, even to the extent of eliminating altogether the right to recover in damages. If we send this bill out with a fair, full, and free discussion of it, the people will not have cause to say that we rushed a bill through here under the whip, a proceeding to which I am not at any time in favor of being a party.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, what is the question before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER].

Mr. HALE. What is that motion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is practically to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill.

Mr. NELSON. I move to lay that motion on the table, in order to pass the House bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota moves to lay the motion of the Senator from Iowa on the table.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLAY. I ask the Chair to again state the question to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] has moved to strike out all of the House bill after the enacting clause and to substitute the bill reported to the Senate in lieu of it. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] moves to lay that motion on the table. On that the Senator from Iowa has demanded the yeas and nays, and the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. FORAKER. If the motion to lay on the table prevails, then the question recurs on the House bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the House bill.

Mr. BACON. I understand that the substitute the Senator from Iowa has moved in place of the original House bill is the bill which was introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is an amendment to the bill introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BACON. It is the bill of the Senator from Wisconsin as reported back by the committee?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Yes; as reported back by the committee. That is correct. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BORAH. I was not in the Chamber when the question was stated. I should like to have it repeated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] proposed an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the House bill. That amendment was the bill introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] as reported back to the Senate by the Committee on Education and Labor. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] moves to lay the motion of the Senator from Iowa upon the table. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I do not know how he would vote if he were present, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. Not being advised as to how he would vote, and not seeing him present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. DEPEW (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. MCENERY]. I do not see him present, and therefore I withhold my vote until he may come in. I will say, however, that I am in favor of the House bill.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who is detained by illness. I do not know how he would vote if present, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. ELKINS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. I do not know how he would vote if present, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. FRAZIER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE]. He is absent, and I do not know how he would vote on this question. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. GAMBLE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. Not knowing how he would vote on this particular question if he were here, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FOSTER. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who is absent. I do not know how he would vote if he were present, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. WARNER]. He not being present, and not knowing how he would vote, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. DEPEW. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. MCENERY] to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT] and vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—35.

Ankeny	Depew	Johnston	Simmons
Bacon	Dick	Kean	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	du Pont	Knox	Stone
Burnham	Foraker	Long	Sutherland
Burrows	Frye	Nelson	Taliaferro
Carter	Gallinger	Paynter	Teller
Clark, Wyo.	Gary	Perkins	Warren
Culberson	Hale	Richardson	Wetmore
Curtis	Heyburn	Scott

NAYS—22.

Allison	Brown	Flint	Money
Bankhead	Burkett	Gore	Piles
Beveridge	Clapp	Guggenheim	Smoot
Borah	Clarke, Ark.	Hopkins	Stephenson

Daniel	Hemenway	Nixon	Tillman
Davis	Kittredge	Owen	Warner
Dillingham	La Follette	Overman

So Mr. NELSON's motion to lay Mr. DOLLIVER's motion on the table was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] propounded an inquiry to the Senator in charge of the bill, the junior Senator from Iowa, which, if he answered as the Senator from Michigan conceived it must be, would end this entire discussion and debar the Congress of any jurisdiction over the subject-matter concerning which we propose to legislate to-day.

As I understand the Senator's question, directed to the Senator from Iowa, he said, "Is it the understanding of the Senator from Iowa that the protection of the employee under the terms of this bill facilitates interstate commerce? If that is answered in the negative, our jurisdiction must fail."

I think, Mr. President, the Supreme Court, in passing upon the employers' liability act of 1906, fairly settled the question propounded by the Senator from Michigan. It will be found that in the course of the opinion in that case the court said:

1. The proposition that there is an absolute want of power in Congress to enact the statute is based on the assumption that as the statute is solely addressed to the regulation of the relations of the employer to those whom he employs and the relation of those employed by him among themselves it deals with subjects which can not under any circumstances come within the power conferred upon Congress to regulate commerce.

That is a square statement of the question presented by the Senator from Michigan. In response to that proposition the Supreme Court makes these observations:

As it is patent that the act does regulate the relation of master and servant in the cases to which it applies, it must follow that the act is beyond the authority of Congress if the proposition just stated be well founded. But we may not test the power of Congress to regulate commerce solely by abstractly considering the particular subject to which a regulation relates, irrespective of whether the regulation in question is one of interstate commerce. On the contrary, the test of power is not merely the matter regulated, but whether the regulation is directly one of interstate commerce, or is embraced within the grant conferred on Congress to use all lawful means necessary and appropriate to the execution of the power to regulate commerce. We think the unsoundness of the contention, that because the act regulates the relation of master and servant, it is unconstitutional, because under no circumstances and to no extent can the regulation of such subject be within the grant of authority to regulate commerce, is demonstrable. We say this because we fail to perceive any just reason for holding that Congress is without power to regulate the relation of master and servant, to the extent that regulations adopted by Congress on that subject are solely confined to interstate commerce, and therefore are within the grant to regulate that commerce or within the authority given to use all means appropriate to the exercise of the powers conferred. To illustrate: Take the case of an interstate railway train; that is, a train moving in interstate commerce, and the regulation of which therefore is, in the nature of things, a regulation of such commerce. It can not be said that because a regulation adopted by Congress as to such train when so engaged in interstate commerce deals with the relation of the master to the servants operating such train or the relations of the servants engaged in such operation between themselves, that it is not a regulation of interstate commerce. This must be, since to admit the authority to regulate such train, and yet to say that all regulations which deal with the relation of master and servants engaged in its operation are invalid for want of power would be but to concede the power and then to deny it, or, at all events, to recognize the power and yet to render it incomplete.

It appears to me that this language of the Supreme Court is a sufficient and conclusive answer to the Senator from Michigan on that particular point.

One word, Mr. President, upon another phase of this question. I have just cast my vote in favor of the bill of the House, practically as against the substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa, and for a reason which I deem it important to state. To begin with, it must be known to all men, whether lawyers or not, that it is extremely difficult at best to legislate upon the subject before us within strict constitutional lines. The Congress exercising its best judgment failed so to do on a former occasion. Therefore, it seems to me it becomes the duty of Congress in attempting to legislate upon this subject within the constitutional limitation fixed to confine itself to the simplest possible application and expression of the law.

The bill of the House relates wholly to persons engaged in interstate commerce on steam railways. The substitute proposed to apply the law to all forms of interstate commerce and foreign commerce as well. To that broad expanse I objected, because I know, as every lawyer knows, that in invading the domain of maritime jurisdiction and foreign commerce as conducted upon shipboard we are obtruding our enactment into a body of law as ancient as commerce itself. The great body of maritime law is made up of parliamentary enactments, judicial legislation, and the views of publicists and jurists upon the subject.

It is largely built upon custom dating back into the dim and remote days of antiquity, adjusted slowly but surely and effectively to the growth of commerce in each and every age that has passed. Ships were plying on the sea and maritime law was in force before any man dreamed of a railroad train or motive power by steam or electricity.

That great volume of that law relating to contracts for and treatment in service applies to conditions and subjects wholly dissimilar from the relations of a railroad employee to the company conducting the corporate business. It is well known that the relation of master and servant, or rather of seaman and master on board vessels, is a peculiar relation from the very nature of the work and the manner of doing it. A certain paternalism exists. A certain arbitrary control is of necessity enforced and recognized as proper and necessary on board a ship. There is the duty of the master to provide proper food, the duty of the master to provide proper medical attention, the duty of the master to enter into a written contract, the application of the statute of frauds to that contract, and all the multiplicity of peculiar arrangements growing out of control in port and the navigation of a vessel on the high seas. Then jurisdiction changes. The 3-mile limit passed a rule which, applied within, is not applicable without that limit.

Mr. President, we could proceed here by the hour to show that where we might make an enactment intended for the relief of the railroad employees of the country apply to seamen on the high seas we would inevitably chance making the law unconstitutional and void, because there is as much difference between the relationship of the seaman to the vessel and the relationship of the railroad man to the train as there is between night and day. A rule of law entirely suitable in the one case might well be held utterly intolerable as to the other.

If we shall ever deem it necessary to take up the subject of seamen engaged in foreign commerce as conducted on shipboard it will be necessary to pursue investigations of which none of these committees have ever dreamed in connection with any of these bills. Then, indeed, would the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] be justified in rising again in his place and saying that he knew nothing about the subject and wanted more time to consider it. None of us would know much about it without a painstaking investigation and special care in order to adjust the enactment of Congress to a body of law and a state of facts more ancient than all the Congresses in Christendom.

For the reason that this bill, if made applicable to foreign commerce as conducted in vessels, would have brought a complication into the enactment which might and probably would be fatal to it when put to the test, I felt that it was better to vote down that substitute and confine our activities and best judgment to the subject-matter which challenges the attention of the country to-day and deal with that in the simplest possible fashion.

We do know that the enactments of the States of late years have liberalized, and properly so, the ancient and rigid rules of the common law with reference to the liability of the master for negligence, the doctrine of contributory negligence, and the rules relating to fellow-servants. These rules have outlived their usefulness. The rules had become harsh as applied to modern conditions, and we are but following the States as far as we can along interstate-commerce lines.

I desire that this enactment shall apply to the great army of men who are engaged in operating trains in interstate commerce. If we succeed in getting through the Congress an enactment which will be approved by the Supreme Court on that subject, we will have achieved a great triumph, and we can later take up the subject of the rights of seamen on board the ships. The mechanism of the ship is very materially different in different cases. The steam vessel, the sailing vessel, and the rules and regulations applicable to each will have to be considered then. The adjudications under maritime law will be the subject of investigation, and it will prove a most instructive line of inquiry when we reach that branch of the subject.

At present, Mr. President, I desire to cooperate with my fellow-Senators here in the passage of a bill which relates to railroad employees alone, and I hope that the bill as it came from the House will pass the Senate without being complicated by needless extension to other and less pressing subjects.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, for information I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa the significance of section 8 of the bill now under consideration. Section 8 of the House bill seems to preserve certain rights under a law that has been plainly declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I think that the section referred to has no significance, and it ought not to be left in the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then I hope the Senator will eliminate that.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I may later offer an amendment to that effect.

Mr. President, I move to substitute for section 3 of the House bill the corresponding section in the Senate substitute which has just been voted upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa moves to strike out section 3 of the bill and to insert what will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 3 of the House bill and in lieu thereof to insert:

That in any action brought against any common carrier under or by virtue of any of the provisions of this act to recover damages for injuries to or the death of any of its employees, the fact that such employee was guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in accordance with the amount of negligence they may find is attributable to such employee: Provided, That no such employee who may be injured or killed shall be held to have been guilty of contributory negligence in any case where the violation of any law for the promotion of the safety of employees by such common carrier contributed to the injury or death of such employee. All questions of fact relating to negligence shall be for the jury to determine.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BACON. I should like the Senator to point out the distinction. Of course I know there is one, but having heard it hurriedly read he had better point it out.

Mr. DOLLIVER. In the House provision, in section 3, the limitation of the law to a subject over which we have jurisdiction seems to have been neglected. It says:

That in all actions hereafter brought against any such common carrier by railroad to recover damages for personal injuries to an employee.

Without confining it to the subject of which we have jurisdiction, and I fear it might give rise to exactly the question which the Supreme Court passed on adversely.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa if it is the purpose of his amendment simply to confine it to interstate commerce?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. I think it is a good provision.

Mr. NELSON. I have carefully compared the two sections. The only material difference I can find in the legal effect of the two sections is in the last sentence of section 3 in the Senate bill, which reads:

All questions of fact relating to negligence shall be for the jury to determine.

That is about the only material change.

Mr. BACON. I have endeavored to find the language to which the Senator refers. In the hurried reading by the Secretary it is not practicable to locate it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. In section 3 of the House bill this language is used:

That in all actions hereafter brought against any such common carrier by railroad to recover damages for personal injuries to an employee.

In the section which I have offered as an amendment the following language is used:

That in any action brought against any common carrier under or by virtue of any of the provisions of this act.

Mr. BACON. I think the Senator is overcautious. I think the court would rule that anyhow. I do not think there is a possible question about it.

Mr. HOPKINS. It would be better to adopt the amendment.

Mr. BACON. I do not see any material objection to it, except that if the bill is correct as it is, we ought not to unnecessarily change it. Section 3 must necessarily have reference to the subject-matter of the bill, and while it does express it more definitely, I do not hesitate in the opinion—I may be wrong—that any court in the world would necessarily hold that section 3 was limited entirely to cases arising under interstate-commerce jurisdiction.

Mr. HALE. I think I am more interested in the last part of the amendment. I wish the Senator in charge of the bill would state what is the effect of it as compared with the House bill which has been taken up by the Senate.

Mr. DOLLIVER. That sentence is not found in the corresponding House section.

Mr. HALE. Will not the Senator read it as it would read if amended?

Mr. BACON. I think I can suggest to the Senator what is the meaning and purpose of that provision. It is a well-known fact that in Federal courts judges exercise very much more liberty in stating to the jury what has been proved or has not been proved than they do in the State courts. I presume that that section is undoubtedly designed to restrain the liberty and power of the Federal judges in that regard as it is now exercised by them. I can not imagine any other reason, because the general jurisdiction of the facts, as Senators know, is one always within the province of the jury. So if it has not some such special meaning as that it would be surplusage.

Mr. HALE. That is why I called the attention of the Senator to it. I wish he would read the section as it would read if his amendment should prevail.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The latter part of the section would read:

Provided, That no such employee who may be injured or killed shall be held to have been guilty of contributory negligence in any case where the violation of any law for the promotion of the safety of employees by such common carrier contributed to the injury or death of such employee.

Then follows this sentence, which does not appear in the House bill:

All questions of fact relating to negligence shall be for the jury to determine.

The law of 1906 contains this sentence at the end of that section:

All questions of negligence and contributory negligence shall be for the jury.

Mr. HALE. It is substantially the same.

Mr. DOLLIVER. No; "all questions of fact relating to negligence shall be for the jury to determine." I will say candidly to the Senate that the purpose of it is to remind our judges that questions of fact under our system of jurisprudence are for the jury. The old commentators have pointed that out as the chief element of the stability in our system of the administering of justice, but in many courts of the United States the custom has grown up for the judge not only to instruct the jury as to questions of law but to make a distinct finding as to what the evidence shows as to each matter connected with the case, and then wind up his instructions with a cheerful suggestion that the questions of fact arising from the evidence are for the jury. I wanted this sentence so put in here as a sort of protest from the legislative department of the Government that we desire the old precepts of the law to be observed, and that the judges should abstain from interfering with the jury's undoubted constitutional right to determine the facts in the case.

Mr. HALE. I supposed that was the object. The Senator has stated it very clearly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, it seems to me that the provisions of the House bill are preferable to those of the Senate bill. It does not seem to me that it is at all necessary to provide in section 3, as suggested by the Senator from Iowa, that hereafter "any action brought against any common carrier under or by virtue of any of the provisions of this act," and so on, because the section in the House bill refers only to the actions which are already provided for in the bill. Section 3 of the bill does not define the jurisdiction. The jurisdiction is already defined in the preceding section; and when in section 3 we speak of an action hereafter brought, it means such an action as is defined by the preceding section of the bill.

I think the language of the House bill is preferable in another respect. The language of the House bill is that "the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence," while that proposed by the Senate is that "the damages shall be diminished by the jury in accordance with the amount."

I think the word "proportion" in that connection is preferable to the words "in accordance." In addition to that there is a proviso in the House bill—

That no such employee who may be injured or killed shall be held to have been guilty of contributory negligence in any case where the violation by such common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety, etc.

While the Senate bill provides that "in any case where the violation of any law for the promotion of the safety," and so forth. I think evidently what is intended by the Senate bill is to limit the operation to cases arising under statutes, while the use of the word "law" in the section might be given altogether too broad a construction. In other words, it might be held to apply to the principles of the common law, which we do not, I think, intend to incorporate here, or it might apply to city ordinances.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Iowa will not insist upon that change. I see no reason whatever for it. If the suggestion that it is necessary was at all tenable, then, of course, I would offer no objection. But I do not think it can possibly be that any lawyer, upon consideration, will for a moment hesitate in the opinion that the section as found in the House bill is applicable only to the question of interstate commerce. It seems to me there could be no possible doubt about that.

Why should we change a provision in the bill unnecessarily? The harmonious nature of the bill is preserved by not amending it except where it is necessary. I should myself feel constrained to vote against it, and I would be more than glad if the Senator would not put me to the necessity of voting against his proposition in that regard.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HEYBURN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 9, after the word "injury," insert the words "in the course of such employment."

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I will add only a word, as to this amendment, to what I already have said. I think it goes to the question of the constitutionality of the act. I do not think it is competent for us to enact that anybody shall be liable for an injury the result of accident at the hands of somebody else. I think that it reintroduces into the bill the very objection which was the spirit of the Supreme Court's decision.

It will be clear, upon an examination, that the words at the end of the section do not cover this defect, because they relate only to the employer and not to the employee, and the words contained in the amendment relate to the employee and not to the employer. If the accident happens in the course of such employment then it is directly connected with the employment, but if an employee while employed or standing inside the window of a shop were shot through the window by an outside party or hurt with a rock or anything else incident to a riot, it would not be intended, under this provision, that the employer should be liable for that injury, because it is not an injury received in pursuit of the employment. I think you will find it is necessary to adopt this language in order to cover that defect.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I offer a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Secretary will read the original amendment and then the substitute offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

The SECRETARY. The amendment proposed by Mr. HEYBURN is, in section 1, page 1, line 9, after the word "injury," to insert the words "in the course of such employment."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I move to strike out, in lines 9 and 10, the words "he is employed by such carrier in such commerce," and to insert what I send to the desk.

I think the objection raised by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] is meritorious and goes to the very life of the bill, and a failure to correct it at this time will subject the bill, if we pass it, to the same sort of decision that nullified the act in the first instance. It seems to me as though in the preparation of the bill it might have been expressly designed that it should again fall under the condemnation of the courts, as it did when the act was passed in 1906.

The only kind of liability that we can create against an interstate carrier is in favor of the employees who are actually engaged in interstate commerce at the time the injury is inflicted. The mere relation to the interstate carrier does not create a liability of which we can take cognizance and against which we can provide.

The relation of the carrier is a source of jurisdiction here. We can not seize upon the mere incident that the corporation is sometimes engaged in interstate commerce, or is habitually engaged in interstate commerce, and make that the ground of liability regardless of the particular circumstances out of which the particular injury grew. That is the plain language of the decision of the United States court. It seems to me it would be an unwise policy for us to leave that question fairly open here.

Mr. CULLOM. Let the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas be read.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I beg pardon; I thought it had been read. I ask that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas will be read.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, page 1, line 9, after the word "while," strike out the words "he is employed by such carrier in such commerce" and insert:

Actually engaged as an employee of such carrier in assisting said carrier in carrying on such commerce, the said injury or death being so inflicted on such employee by or from causes incident to his so assisting said carrier in carrying on such commerce and while so actually engaged.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest that in order to avoid confusion the Senate shall first consider the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho. The question is first on that amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is not the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas an amendment to the amendment? I suggest that it is all contained in the words that I have proposed, I submit to the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho comes in at a point independent entirely of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas. The question is first on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Before the vote is taken upon that amendment, I will state that it leaves the matter doubtful, whereas the substitute I offer removes all doubt about it, and we understand exactly what we are voting for. The Senator from Idaho proposes to insert "in the course of such employment." That does not necessarily mean he must be engaged in it. It leaves the doubtful words the meaning of which has not been settled colloquially or in law to be determined by the court, when it ought not to be left in any state of doubt. The court may say those words are to have some meaning assigned to them by a process of interpretation of the statute and it may make the statute doubtful. I do think at this stage of the consideration of the measure and in this presence, we ought to understand what we want to do and we should do it in such specific terms that nobody may hereafter have any doubt about what we may have done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas proposes an amendment, which the Secretary will again state.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 9, after the word "while," strike out the words "he is employed by such carrier in such commerce" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Actually engaged as an employee of such carrier in assisting said carrier in carrying on such commerce, the said injury or death being so inflicted on such employee by or from causes incident to his so assisting said carrier in carrying on such commerce and while so actually engaged.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to ask the Senator from Arkansas a question. Would his proposed amendment cover such a case as this: An interstate carrier engaged in interstate commerce has a man in charge of a water tank located exclusively within a State. The water tank, of course, feeds the engines that are engaged in interstate commerce. The employee at the water tank is injured by the neglect of a fellow-workman. Does the Senator think that his amendment would exclude such a case? Such a man ought to recover.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is not intended to exclude anybody.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am inclined to agree with the Senator. I think he has raised the most important point that has been raised here, and that is that we are likely in our haste to put through a bill which, as the Senator says, may be designed to fall under the court's condemnation.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas rose.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will make my question clear, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. An interstate carrier has some men engaged 100 miles away over on the line chopping down timber for ties or anything of that kind. Such an employee would be excluded by the Senator's amendment in order to save the bill, but would he think that an employee engaged in the occupation in my question as first put would be excluded?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The limitations of the doctrine have never been permanently fixed by the court. We simply know that if we undertake to extend the remedy to persons who are not actually engaged in interstate commerce we would simply render the whole attempt nugatory.

I have not any way of saying what particular cause of action will be covered by the bill, because I do not have the last say about it. I do not know what the court might say about the particular causes of action covered by it, but I am perfectly advised that if we include any cause of action not within the competency of Congress we nullify the entire legislation.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does not the Senator think it would be safer legislation to take the action of the committee that has carefully considered this subject, rather than to formulate amendments here on the floor without mature deliberation?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Most obviously.

Mr. HOPKINS. The committee maintains that the bill as it is framed at the present time covers the very objection that the Senator has made. That section has been framed with great care by great lawyers, and why not leave it as it is rather than attempt to go into the domain of speculation by adopting amendments which have not received full consideration?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I do not consider that anything the committee has done or can do can nullify what Judge White said in the majority opinion in the case before the Supreme Court. He said in express terms that we must limit our legislation to such injuries as occur in the actual conduct of interstate commerce. Of course I only desire to present it to the Senate. It is a matter of indifference to me personally whether it is adopted or not. I believe if the court adhere to the text of its decision it will nullify the bill if it is permitted to pass in its present form.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, it looks to me as if the phraseology in this section is perfectly responsive to the criticism of Mr. Justice White in the decision of the employers' liability act. This does limit it to any person suffering injuries while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce—that is to say, in that form of commerce over which we have jurisdiction.

I have never been able to understand where these fine figures of speech come from which make out that the carrier can be held responsible for damages occurring by outsiders, by tramps, and so forth; by persons throwing rocks through the windows, and all that sort of thing. All this phraseology is limited by the last six lines of the section, and the damages are distinctly said to be "for such injury or death resulting in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier."

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The language to which the Senator from Arkansas objects, and which he proposes to amend, is as follows:

Shall be liable in damages to any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce.

I gave an illustration in my question to the Senator from Arkansas a moment ago which I will repeat to the Senator from Iowa. An interstate railroad—such, for instance, as the Union Pacific—is engaged in interstate commerce. It has in its employ a group of men located in a timber region, 100 miles away, let us suppose, who are engaged in felling trees, getting ready ties, or anything else. There are such gangs of men. Does not the Senator think that if one of those men is injured in the felling of trees he would be covered by the terms of the bill, because plainly he is employed by a carrier of interstate commerce?

Mr. DOLLIVER. That is not the term of the bill. The bill says not "employed by a carrier of interstate commerce," but "employed by such carrier in such commerce."

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let us see. It reads:

While he is employed by such carrier in such commerce.

Now, would not the case which I have supposed be governed by the bill? The men are employed by carriers in this commerce.

Mr. DOLLIVER. But are they employed in such commerce, in interstate commerce?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is the very point the Senator from Arkansas proposes to make clear by his amendment.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I think it is clear now.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I put it to the Senator, and he has not yet answered it, in an illustration such as I have given—of men employed by a carrier in interstate commerce. What the Senator from Arkansas proposes to do is to clearly limit it to an accident occurring while they are engaged in the work of interstate commerce.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Does the Senator understand that a man cutting wood in Minnesota is engaged in interstate commerce?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. He is employed by a company which is engaged in the carriage of interstate commerce. Now, that is the question.

To my mind, Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas has put his finger upon an exceedingly questionable feature of the bill. I do not go so far by any manner of means as the Senator from Arkansas in suggesting that this may have been framed in the bill for the purpose of invalidating it again before the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If I made any statement that it was deliberately done, I was misunderstood and I did not express the idea in my mind. I said it might have that effect when there is a difference of opinion about it, and if I was preparing it for the express purpose of bringing it in conflict with that decision I would employ some such language as is employed here.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. As one of those who are equally earnest with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] in the wish to see a bill passed that will not again fall under the condemnation of the court, and as an interested listener to this debate, I suggest that the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]—whose legal acumen and learning have so often been illustrated upon this floor for us not to take it weightily—is worthy of the Senator's consideration. I am in favor of the strongest law we can pass, and we should be careful that no provision is included which might again subject it to defeat in the courts. I hoped that the act of 1906 would stand; it failed. This act must not fail. It is humane, just, and necessary. I wish it might cover all employees. Since the court has decided that it can not, we must be very careful that we furnish no excuse for again overthrowing it. It is because the Senator from Arkansas has raised this doubt that I shall vote for his amendment. It makes the bill more surely valid.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. TELLER. Let the amendment be read, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again stated, at the request of the Senator from Colorado.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 9, after the word "while," it is proposed to strike out the words "he is employed by such carrier in such commerce" and to insert "actually engaged as an employee of such carrier in assisting said carrier in carrying on such commerce, the said injury or death being so inflicted on such employee by or from causes incident to his so assisting said carrier in carrying on such commerce and while so actually engaged."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if that amendment is to be voted on, is an amendment to the amendment now in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then I should like to move an amendment to the amendment. I move to strike out all after the word "his" in the amendment and to insert the word "occupation." The language after that is a repetition. I should like to have the amendment now reported as proposed to be amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan proposes an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "his," being the words "so assisting said carrier in carrying on such commerce and while so actually engaged," and inserting the word "occupation."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Let the amendment be read as proposed to be amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. As proposed to be amended the amendment would read:

Actually engaged as an employee of such carrier in assisting said carrier in carrying on such commerce, the said injury or death being so inflicted on such employee by or from causes incident to his occupation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I trust the Senator from Arkansas will accept it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I do not catch the scope of the modification proposed by the Senator from Michigan from hearing it rapidly read at the desk. I had it in view to observe the statement made by Judge White, in his opinion, when he said substantially that it was not within the competency of Congress to regulate the persons who are engaged in interstate commerce, but it could only so regulate them while actively engaged in such commerce, and then only in connection with the thing they were so actually doing.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator will permit me, the object of my amendment is to make the sentence more concise.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If the Senator's amendment does not sacrifice any of the clearness of my amendment, I have no objection, to be sure, to conciseness.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If I have accomplished that, that is all that I aim at. It is not my intention to weaken the amendment in any particular.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, after examining the amendment to my amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], I will state that it is satisfactory.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] as amended.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In the absence of that Senator I withhold my vote.

Mr. CLAY (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who is necessarily absent from the Senate. Were he present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. DEPEW (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. MCENERY]; but I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I again announce my general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FOSTER (when his name was called). In the absence of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], with whom I am paired, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FRAZIER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GAMBLE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I will withhold my vote for the present. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. JOHNSTON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. WARNER]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I inquire if the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have a general pair with that Senator, who is absent, and I therefore withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GAMBLE. Since my name was called an arrangement has been made whereby I transfer my pair with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS—21.

Bacon	Depew	Martin	Taliaferro

So the amendment of Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas as amended was rejected.

Mr. CULBERSON obtained the floor.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CULBERSON. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I want to ask a question. Is it not now in order, under the rules, that the amendment, the substitute for which has been voted down, be resubmitted to the Senate?

Mr. GALLINGER (to Mr. HEYBURN). Your amendment was voted down.

Mr. HEYBURN. My amendment could not have been voted down until the substitute was disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it not in order now, under the rules, that the amendment, the substitute for which has been voted down, shall be resubmitted to the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There was no amendment proposed in the nature of a substitute. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] was independent of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]; or, in other words, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas, while dealing with the same general subject embodied in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho, was offered to a different portion of the bill, and not as an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think the RECORD will disclose the fact that the Senator from Arkansas stated when he rose and addressed the Chair that he offered it as a substitute for the amendment which I had offered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If that was so, it was an inaccurate statement on the part of the Senator from Arkansas, because the Senator from Idaho offered his amendment to come in on line 9, following the word "injury." The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas followed the word "while," in the same line. The amendments offered were addressed to different parts of the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment. After the first section I move to insert the following:

Provided, That suits instituted in State courts for injuries or death resulting from the negligence of common carriers organized under State laws, or from the negligence of their officers, agents, or servants while engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, shall not be removable to the courts of the United States.

Several criticisms of this bill have been made——

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes.

Mr. BURROWS. Would not the Senator permit his amendment to be read from the desk?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 1 it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That suits instituted in State courts for injuries or death resulting from the negligence of common carriers organized under State laws, or from the negligence of their officers, agents, or servants, while engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, shall not be removable to the courts of the United States.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senate for a moment, I desire to say that many criticisms have been made of this bill, and many suggestions have been made for its improvement. Many inquiries have been made concerning the effect and operation of the provisions of the bill. Without reference to all of these, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to one question. This is a bill fixing the liability of railway corporations in certain cases. In some respects it will doubtless be claimed as the source of authority upon which suits will be instituted against railway corporations for the recovery of damages for injuries to persons, whether resulting in death or not.

The Federal judiciary act provides that the circuit courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction, among other cases, where the amount in controversy is over $2,000, in all cases arising under the laws of the United States. The act of Congress in regard to the removal of suits from State to Federal courts provides that suits of that character—that is, suits involving over $2,000 and arising under the laws of the United States—may be removed by defendants to the United States courts.

Without going into this matter at length, I want to invite attention to the extraordinary result that may follow from the passage of this bill unless the amendment which I have proposed shall be adopted, and that is this: A railway corporation of the State of Texas which may happen to have on its train interstate articles of freight may be sued in the United States courts of Texas by a citizen of Texas for injuries or death which may result from the operation of such a train on the ground that the cause of action arises under this act of Congress. That is one result of this bill in the view expressed by some that this act will be exclusive of State authority if it shall become a law. Not only that, but if a citizen of Texas shall sue a railway corporation organized under the laws of Texas whose line of railway does not even extend beyond the limits of the State, if the act occurred by which the injuries resulted while that train was, though within the limits of Texas, carrying interstate commerce, that Texas corporation under this bill may remove the case to the United States court to have it determined there, because not only may it be said that the right of action so far as this law is concerned arises under this act, but it may be that the corporation will declare in its pleadings that its defense rests upon a proper construction of this act of Congress.

All I ask the Senate to do at this time is at least to confine the removal of the cases to those other than those between a citizen of a State and a domestic corporation of a State.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let the amendment be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again stated.

The Secretary again read the amendment submitted by Mr. CULBERSON.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I was going to ask the Senator from Texas, who offered this amendment, what would be the effect if the parties had diverse citizenship? You could not prevent them under the Constitution from removing the cause by statutory declaration.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly not.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will state frankly to the Senator from Idaho, Mr. President, that this amendment does not contemplate an exclusion of the right of removal when that right depends upon diverse citizenship.

Mr. BORAH. I ask to have the amendment again read, Mr. President.

Mr. CULBERSON. The amendment was written hastily by me, and it may not cover the case exactly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will again be stated, at the request of the Senator from Idaho.

The Secretary again read the proposed amendment of Mr. CULBERSON.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I will merely suggest to the Senator from Texas that as the amendment is drawn, in my opinion, it is in contravention of the Constitution of the United States, section 2, Article III.

Mr. CULBERSON. What is that provision?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is the judiciary section.

Mr CULBERSON. I understand that, but I should like to have the Senator from Idaho point out the respect in which it is in violation of the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. It would prevent parties from removing who are living in different States; that is, it would undertake to do so, and, under the Constitution, they have a right to remove if there is a question of diverse citizenship.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, there is no constitutional right to remove a case from a State court to a United States court. It is entirely statutory. The Senator reads from the declaration in the Constitution as to the extent of the judicial power. Judicial power can not be exerted unless an act of Congress is passed conferring jurisdiction upon some court, and no removal from a State court to a court of the United States can be made except under an act of Congress. But, as I stated, there is no purpose here to affect the right of removal, except with reference to this particular statute, and I am willing to add an amendment providing "except upon the ground of diverse citizenship."

Mr. BORAH. I merely suggested the matter for the consideration of the Senator.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the section of the Constitution to which the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] referred, it seems to me, practically settles this proposed amendment. It is the judiciary section.

> The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, etc.

Now, the removal act, as everybody knows, is to give effect to that provision of the Constitution; it is vitalizing that provision of the Constitution.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. May I call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the fact that the right of removal now is confined to nonresident defendants? The language of the Constitution, observe now, limits the right to nonresident defendants, but under the jurisdiction act of 1875 the plaintiff or defendant, either one, might have a cause removed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. This amendment does not go to that.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I understand that; but the right of removal is not a constitutional right. It is a subject to be regulated by Congress, and by this Congress as much as any other Congress that ever assembled.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is not the point I made. I suppose neither the Senator nor any other lawyer will contravene the statement that the removal act is to give effect to this section of the Constitution, and that is the reason why it was put in there.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. To give effect to so much of it as, in the judgment of Congress, it is worth while for them to give effect to.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It gets all its vitality from that. That is the reason it was passed, and, to that extent it is, as it were, reading into the Constitution, as the Constitution has authorized us to do, applications of the jurisdiction. Now, the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] pointed out, is in contravention to that. That is very clear.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I submit if there were no act of Congress providing for the removal, the Constitution itself would not give it in any case.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; nor does the Constitution give rights in many instances, except where Congress provides the machinery for carrying them into effect.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, aside from the learned discussion the Senators are now indulging in, I think that a very slight consideration of the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas will disclose the fact that the question of diverse citizenship can not arise in any proceeding to remove a case, for the reason that the defendant in the case is distinctly specified to be one who would be a citizen or resident of Texas, to wit, a domestic corporation of Texas, which corporation can not have any right to remove.

The suit may be brought by the plaintiff, who is either a resident or a nonresident. If he is a nonresident of Texas, he would have his right, in the first instance, to seek the Federal jurisdiction, and therefore there would be no question of removal, because he would already be in that court. If he is a resident of Texas, he can not exercise the right to remove, because both he and the defendant corporation would be residents of the State of Texas.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If that is so, the amendment is not necessary.

Mr. BACON. No; not at all. The Senator from Indiana, I think, jumps at too speedy a conclusion. As I understand the purpose of the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas, it is to guard against the proposition that this right of action, being founded upon a Federal statute, there may be asserted a claim of right of removal on that ground; and it is to negative that possibility, as I understand, that the Senator from Texas has offered this amendment. It is impossible that a question of diverse citizenship can arise under the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Before the Senator takes his seat I will say that I have totally misapprehended the amendment if it is as the Senator from Georgia states. The impression I gathered from the amendment was that it referred to railroad corporations organized under State laws; that is, under the laws of any State.

Mr. BACON. Oh, no; under the law of the State of Texas, if it were in Texas.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The inference that I draw was that it referred to a corporation organized under State law as distinguished from a corporation organized under national law. If the Senator will bear with me just a moment, in order that we may have that definitely settled, I should like to have the amendment again read.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have the amendment, Mr. President, in my hand and I will read it. It is as follows:

> Provided, That suits instituted in State courts for injuries or death resulting from the negligence of common carriers organized under State laws, or from the negligence of their officers, agents, or servants, while engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, shall not be removable to the courts of the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think that is the way I understood it when it was first read—"corporations organized under State laws."

Mr. BACON. I may have misconstrued it, but I construed it to mean corporations organized under the laws of the State in which the suit should be brought.

Mr. BORAH. I simply want to say, Mr. President, that when the amendment was first read I did not hear the first clause of it, which refers to suits to be begun in State courts, and therefore I desire to modify the statement which I made in reference to it.

Mr. BACON. Upon inquiry of the Senator from Texas, he tells me that the construction which I put upon it was the one which he intended.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have no doubt of that, but it shows that the amendment is open to misconstruction, inasmuch as we have two sorts of railway corporations, one organized under State laws and the other organized under national laws. So, when you speak of corporations organized under State laws, it seems to me that it necessarily refers to the class which I have mentioned.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Texas will not modify his amendment to make it in conformity to the understanding of the Senator from Georgia. Two-thirds of the railway mileage in the State of Arkansas is operated by corporations organized in States other than the State of Arkansas, and there is no reason why these cases should be removed any more than why the cause of action against a national bank should be removed. When the national banking system was instituted there was no limitation upon the right of national banks to try in the Federal courts all actions that related to them or their affairs or actions brought against them. That proved to be such a manifest inconvenience that it amounted to an injustice, and in 1882 Congress passed an act providing that no such ground of jurisdiction in the Federal courts should exist. It has not operated to the disadvantage of the national banks. It has rather tended to popularize them, in the negative sense, by the removal of one of the sources of unpopularity under which at times they rested.

I can see no reason why that same wholesome rule should not be applied to causes of action that may arise under this proposed law. It is a great inconvenience to try a lawsuit at a point distant from where the accident occurred. It involves considerable outlay, and it necessitates occasionally the employment of an additional attorney. It is a burden which is not compensated by any good that comes out of it.

So far as the Federal courts are concerned, I have no prejudice against them. I believe trials in Federal courts are more expeditious; they are usually conducted with more intelligence; and there are many reasons, so far as litigation in which I am personally interested is concerned, that they should be tried there if I had any preference about it; but I know the history of a number of these damage cases, and I know that it will amount to an absolute inconvenience, and an inconvenience that will in many cases amount to a denial of justice, unless some fair limitation is placed upon the jurisdiction of the Federal courts. I think the Senator from Texas ought to press his amendment in the form in which it is written, and ought not to modify it so as to simply provide that where a lawsuit is brought against a corporation created by the laws of a State in which the suit is brought, it shall not be removed because the action arose under the Constitution and laws of the United States. I think that the right of removal ought to be denied regardless of the citizenship of the corporation, the defendant.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON].

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CLAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. Were he present I should vote "yea."

Mr. DEPEW (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. MCENERY]. As he is not present I withhold my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. ELKINS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. FOSTER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. FRAZIER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE]. If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. GAMBLE (when his name was called). I make the same statement I made preceding the last roll call, and under the same arrangement in regard to the transfer of pairs I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BANKHEAD (when Mr. JOHNSTON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON] is paired with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS]. My colleague is necessarily absent from the Chamber. I do not know how he would vote if present.

Mr. MONEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who is absent from the Senate on important business. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. WARNER]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 16, nays 34, as follows:

YEAS—16.

Bacon	Brown	Gary	Paynter
Bankhead	Clarke, Ark.	Gore	Simmons
Borah	Culberson	McCreary	Taliaferro
Bourne	Dixon	Martin	Teller

NAYS—34.

Ankeny	Dick	Hale	Richardson
Brandegee	Dolliver	Hemenway	Scott
Burkett	du Pont	Heyburn	Smith, Mich.
Burnham	Flint	Hopkins	Smoot
Burrows	Foraker	Kean	Stephenson
Carter	Frye	Knox	Sutherland
Clapp	Gallinger	Long	Wetmore
Cullom	Gamble	Nelson
Curtis	Guggenheim	Perkins

NOT VOTING—42.

Aldrich	Depew	McCumber	Platt
Allison	Dillingham	McEnery	Rayner
Bailey	Elkins	McLaurin	Smith, Md.
Beveridge	Foster	Milton	Stewart
Briggs	Frazier	Money	Stone
Bulkeley	Fulton	Newlands	Taylor
Clark, Wyo.	Hansbrough	Nixon	Tillman
Clay	Johnston	Owen	Warner
Crane	Kittredge	Overman	Warren
Daniel	La Follette	Penrose
Davis	Lodge	Piles

So Mr. CULBERSON's amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I said a few moments ago that I would offer an amendment striking out section 8, but in view of the lateness of the hour and my anxiety to get the measure to a final vote, I will withhold the amendment. I intended to move to strike out the section because it is unnecessary, but it does no harm, and I will not propose the amendment.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am reluctant, in view of the suggestion of the learned Senator from Iowa that the hour is late, to further trespass upon the Senate, but there are some difficulties in my mind that I am anxious to have the Senator from Iowa remove, if he will be so kind as to do so.

I want to say in advance that I am not unfriendly to the purpose of this bill; in other words, I am not unfriendly to the object of having applied to railroads the rule of liability to their employees which is prescribed in the bill. The same rule of liability, so far as I can now recall from memory, is now the law of my State, and has been since the year 1863. It has been some thirteen years since I have been in the active practice of law, and therefore my recollection may not be absolutely accurate in this regard; but so far as I am able to recollect, in the examination of this bill the terms, so far as they go, are identical with the present law of Georgia. While I was for a long time in the legislature of my State this was the law.

There was no effort made to change it. It was satisfactory to our people, to the people of the State at large, and, as well, to the railroad employees in particular. I state that in order that my attitude in regard thereto may not be misunderstood. I am in favor of preserving that State law to the railroad employees in Georgia, and I am anxious that nothing shall be done here to destroy that State law.

The troubles which are on my mind, Mr. President, are not those which relate to the question of the propriety of applying these particular rules of liability, but the questions in my mind arise out of some considerations which were suggested by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] and by others as to complications which will arise on account of the enactment of this bill into law as a piece of Federal legislation. It is a matter which raises some questions in my mind now upon which I should like to have some information from the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. President, I have not had the opportunity to make any detailed examination of this question, for while I am upon the Committee on the Judiciary this bill has never been considered by the Committee on the Judiciary. A bill similar to this one was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary in either the Fifty-seventh or the Fifty-eighth Congress, I have forgotten which, while the late Senator Hoar was chairman of the committee, and at his suggestion, as has been narrated here to-day, it was returned to the Senate in order that it might go to the Interstate Commerce Committee. Therefore, I have not had the duty imposed upon me of making an investigation of it. But it is a most important subject and the bill a most far-reaching one, and I assume that the committee, which has been charged with its consideration, and which now presents it to the attention of the Senate with a favorable report for its enactment, has made an examination of all the various difficult and intricate questions which the bill necessarily raises. It is with a view to some of these questions that I want to make a few inquiries of the Senator from Iowa.

In the first place, I am not at all satisfied as to the constitutionality of this bill, but I can scarcely expect careful consideration of that question when men of all parties, here or elsewhere, are tumbling over each other in the effort to appear as its chief advocates. Naturally after this we are to have acts of Congress defining the liability of railroads to interstate passengers, and then to interstate shippers, and so on ad infinitum, until nothing is left to State jurisdiction.

But passing these by, I should like to know whether the Senator from Iowa, speaking for his committee, is able to say definitely, not as a matter of general opinion, but as the result of careful examination, whether the enactment of this bill into a law nullifies all the legislation of each and every State upon the subject of the liability of a railroad to its employees upon any train engaged in interstate commerce?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, while I would not regard it as really necessary to the disposition of the question before us to answer that question, I have no reluctance in giving the honorable Senator my own view about it.

Congress has jurisdiction to regulate interstate commerce. If it exercises the jurisdiction, as I understand it, it does not necessarily nullify, but in a practical sense supersedes State legislation dealing with the same subject.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator kindly differentiate between the supersession of a statute by another statute and the nullification of a statute by another statute?

Mr. DOLLIVER. That is an easy question. To nullify a statute means to disregard and disobey it, and to supersede it means to overlay it with a superior jurisdiction.

Mr. BACON. I should say, Mr. President, that the Senator with the use of the wealth of language that always, I will say, characterizes him, has covered this up in a way that has succeeded in obscuring it by a distinction without a difference. There is no such difference, Mr. President.

I am, however, very glad that the Senator has even gone as far as he has in enlightening me, because so far as he has gone he has accorded with the view which I have had; and I wanted to suggest to the Senator a difficulty in regard to the matter, to find out whether I am correct in it, which has occurred to me.

As I have said, this is now the law of Georgia; and speaking in the interest of the laboring men in my State, and particularly in the interest of railroad employees, many of whom I number among my personal friends and many of whom have been for many years amongst the best friends I have ever had—speaking from that standpoint, I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Iowa to see whether I am correct in my conclusion or not.

The power in Congress to enact this legislation, which will either supersede or annul, it matters not which—it is the same thing in effect—State legislation in this regard, necessarily involves and recognizes and contemplates the power in Congress to change this law after it has been enacted. It not only assumes, in this instance, to make a rule of liability for the employees of railroads, but it necessarily recognizes and contemplates that this may not be a finality, but that there may be changes by Congress in the future, and that there may be changes in a direction not in the interest of the employees of railroads.

And when changes are made by Congress in the future it may be that in any State where we now have a satisfactory law which protects employees of railroad companies, as we have in Georgia, this comes within the recognized field of proper Federal legislation. The time may come, and it is to be apprehended that it will come, when not the employees of railroads will be those who will influence and control legislation in this regard, but when these great railroad corporations will control legislation and enact laws which shall not be in the interest of these employees. When this is done, the Federal law will control and will prevent States from enacting laws and enforcing laws which shall be in the interest of these employees.

Mr. President, these gigantic railroad corporations have great power. The railroads in the United States are estimated to be $15,000,000,000 in value. This proposed legislation will vitally affect that vast property interest. These corporations, not because they are corporations, but because they control this immense aggregation of wealth and wield the consequent immense influence, have great power in elections. They have great power in putting men in office who are to legislate and who are to execute the laws. It is not to be supposed—can anyone be possibly so credulous as to suppose?—that when legislation of this kind, so directly and vitally affecting them, is recognized as something which is to control the relation of these railroad corporations and their employees, they will be indifferent to that legislation, or that they will fail to put in operation with every power at their command the machinery which shall bring about legislation in their particular interest, such legislation as they desire for the protection of their own interest, and not such legislation as we now have in contemplation for the benefit of these employees, and which it is now sought to enact in accordance with the will and wishes of these employees.

Mr. President, as an illustration of the power of these corporations and of those who control these corporations to influence elections, it will be recognized that it is difficult for the community made up of separate individuals to gather together a large fund which shall be used under an emergency in an election; but we know it is a matter of simple operation for those who control these large corporations, with their enormous aggregate wealth, to put suddenly into a campaign a fund which shall control an election.

We have had within the past year or so, through the newspaper press, a statement that in the campaign of nearly four years ago—I think it was in 1904—when the question of the election in the State of New York hung in the balance, and it was apprehended that it might go in a direction adverse to the wishes of some of large influence and power, there was a representative—a controlling representative—of the largest railroad aggregation in the United States summoned to Washington by a telegram or a letter—I have forgotten which—and asked to raise a sum of money which should be used in the New York election for the purpose of saving it from a result which was contrary to the political wish of the party that made the request.

Now, I am not going to say who that was and what high railroad officer it was, but it is a matter of notoriety that in one day that high railroad official came to the city of Washington, and upon the alleged request of a high official of this Government went back to New York and in one day raised $500,000 and put it in the campaign and controlled the election.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. FORAKER. Does not the Senator think he owes it to the high official against whom that charge has been made to say that the official has denied it?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am not assumed to know who that high official was. Possibly the Senator from Ohio knows.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from Georgia stated a few moments ago that it was not necessary for him to mention names, because everybody knew the name of the person to whom he referred.

Mr. BACON. I do not recall that I said that, but if I did, I will stand by that proposition. If everybody knows it, it is not necessary for me to name him.

Mr. FORAKER. It was the statement of the Senator from Georgia, I supposed I understood him, that I ought to know the name of the person to whom he referred, and I thought I ought to call his attention to the fact, so he would not omit to state that the high official contradicted the story, and with an ugly word, to the man who set the story in motion.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, there is a certain very famous club in this country, which by reason of the number of those who have been assigned to its membership—I will not say who have applied for membership, but who have been assigned to its membership—and because of the character of some of them, at least, who have been assigned to its membership, has become a most respectable club.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. GORE. In order that I may contribute something to the literature on this subject, I ask to have the letter read which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[New York Tribune, April 3, 1907.]

OCTOBER 4, 1904.

MY DEAR HARRIMAN: A suggestion has come to me in a roundabout way that you do not think it wise to come on to see me in these closing weeks of the campaign, but that you are reluctant to refuse, inasmuch as I have asked you. Now, my dear sir, you and I are practical men, and you are on the ground and know the conditions better than I do.

If you think there is any danger of your visit to me causing trouble, or if you think there is nothing special I should be informed about or no matter in which I could give aid, why, of course, give up the visit for the time being, and then, a few weeks hence, before I write my message, I shall get you to come down to discuss certain Government matters not connected with the campaign.

With great regards,

Sincerely, yours, THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am not responsible for the bringing in of the name of the President.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will not the Senator from Georgia agree with me that it ought not to have been brought in in this connection?

Mr. BACON. I will not assume to say that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will state it, then, on my own responsibility. I think it is very improper.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. GORE. I assume all the responsibility for the introduction of this letter. I do not think that the President of the United States ought to write a letter that he is unwilling for the Senate and the country to hear read.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the main purpose I have in alluding to this matter is not to take part in any controversy as to the particular influence which caused the subscription of $500,000. I am simply trying to illustrate the danger of this legislation to the employee class, and I illustrated it, not by calling anyone's name, but by a fact which was known to everybody, that whether that $500,000 was called for in the way that it was charged it had been called for or not there was no dispute about the fact that the money was collected hurriedly and put in the campaign.

I am not in a position to say anything one way or the other upon it, because I am not in the confidence of either of the parties. It may be utterly untrue that $500,000 was asked for by anyone here in Washington, but there is one fact which is not disputed by anybody, and that is that the railroad official did, within the limited time of a day or two before the election, in his vast power over aggregate wealth in the control of these very corporations about which we are now legislating, get up the $500,000 which did control the election in New York. That is the point I am after; and it is only by way of inducement that I speak of the way in which it was set in motion or alleged to have been set in motion. It may not be true that it was set in motion in response to the influence which was charged, but there is no doubt about the fact that it was set in motion, and no doubt about the fact and no dispute by anybody that within a day or two that official, by virtue of his great power in the control of this aggregate wealth, did raise the half million dollars and saved the election for a certain party in the State of New York.

Now, the illustration is to the point that this legislation, vitally affecting these corporations to the extent of many millions annually, is not legislation which it is to be supposed in the future these corporations will be indifferent to or neglectful of. It is not to be supposed for a moment that these corporations will idly sit still and fail to use their utmost power in the effort to have legislation enacted on the line which shall be in accordance with their wishes and in accordance with their interests, and not in accordance with the wishes of these employees or in accordance with the interests of these employees.

When they accomplish that, Mr. President, when they accomplish legislation which shall reach the entire United States, and be in force throughout the United States, they will have absolutely checkmated all effort on the part of the States to protect the interests of employees by proper legislation.

They will by Federal legislation nullify any legislation which may be had in any State for the protection of their employees. It will be easier for these corporations to procure the legislation they wish from one Congress than from the legislatures of forty-six States. And when that day comes, sir, the railroad employees in the United States will curse the day that they invoked legislation of this kind at the hands of Congress.

I repeat, this legislation can not do the railroad employees in my State any good. It can not do them any good, because they have now a satisfactory State law which prescribes a rule of liability which fully protects them, a law which heretofore, according to recognized rule, no Federal legislation would interfere with; but if we establish the precedent that Federal legislation shall prescribe a rule by which employees shall seek redress for injuries received in their employment, then Federal law controls thereafter, and the State is powerless to protect them by State legislation. We need not hope that legislation by Congress will always be in the interest of the employees.

Now, Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate by any elaboration of that; but I want to ask the Senator from Iowa another question. Of course the Senator will recognize the fact that on a railroad which may be altogether within a State—in other words, which does not cross a State line—any train which carries upon it any freight or any passengers destined for a point beyond the State line is engaged in interstate commerce, and although it is going to be transferred to another railroad it will be subject to the provisions of this act. Am I correct in that?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. BACON. Very well. Now, I want to ask the Senator a question by way of illustration. Of course, never mind how large a train may be and how full of goods it may be, all the balance of it may be intrastate freight, but if upon that train there is one single box that is to cross the line it makes that train engaged in interstate commerce.

I want to illustrate it to the Senator by a concrete case. We will suppose that a train starts from Richmond to Alexandria. Those are the terminal points for that train. It has freight consigned exclusively to Alexandria or to points between Richmond and Alexandria. That makes it altogether out of the jurisdiction of this bill; but if at Orange Court House, on the way, a man puts on it a box of cigars which is consigned to a party in Baltimore, that would immediately change the character of the train, would it not, and make it after that a train engaged in interstate commerce?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Does the Senator desire my information on the subject?

Mr. BACON. I said to the Senator that I had not had the opportunity to examine this bill, but I knew in a matter of this importance, of course, the Senator's committee has necessarily examined in all of its details every feature of it and is prepared to give us the information, and I am trying to get it from the Senator.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The Senator also said the bill had not been considered by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BACON. It has not.

Mr. DOLLIVER. It has been before that committee more than three months, and the Senator's opportunity to propound questions on the subject has been equal to mine.

Mr. BACON. I will say to the Senator that the Judiciary Committee has not been able to do anything for the last three months, outside of the nominations which have been sent in, except to consider the Senator's liquor bill.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I regret that the committee has been limited to that.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wish to correct my colleague upon the committee. I think it is not quite just for him to say that of the committee. A part of the committee, the subcommittee of which he is a member, has been concerned entirely with the liquor business. Other members of the committee have been concerned with the bill involving the same question, perhaps, that is involved in this bill, but totally different in many of its provisions.

Mr. BACON. I will say to the Senator I am asking questions in good faith, and I ask them because I have not had consideration of the subject. I myself have had my time entirely occupied by the Senator's bill on the subject of interstate commerce in liquors, and I have had no time so far to give to the bill on this subject.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will say to the Senator, if I understand correctly the decisions of the Supreme Court, they are to the effect that a railroad that is entirely within a State, but carrying commerce destined to points outside the State, is engaged in interstate commerce and is subject to the interstate-commerce act.

Mr. BACON. That is a clear statement of the law. Then I am correct in the suggestion that on a train leaving Richmond and coming to Alexandria, those being terminal points, having no freight except for Alexandria and intermediate points, if when it reached Orange Court House a box of cigars were put on it, consigned to Baltimore, it would be converted at once from a train not subject to the provisions of this act into one that is subject to it. Am I correct in that, I ask the Senator from Iowa? I am correct in the conclusion that at Orange Court House it will be converted into a train the employees of which would become engaged in interstate commerce, and everything would be subject to this law at that point and from there to Alexandria.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have no doubt that is true.

Mr. BACON. Very well. The point I want to ask the Senator is this: If on the line of road between Richmond and Orange Court House an accident occurs, the rule of liability would be determined by the law of Virginia, because there would be no interstate commerce; but after the box of cigars had been put on at Orange Court House if an accident and an injury occurred between there and Alexandria, although it was the same train and the same crew and the same people, the rule of liability would be determined by this law. If the injury was incurred before the train reached Orange Court House, the case would go into the State court and be determined by Virginia law. But after the box of cigars had been put on the train at Orange Court House, if an injury occurred to the crew of the same train, the case would go into the Federal court and be determined by the act of Congress as to the rule of liability. Am I correct in that?

Mr. DOLLIVER. If the court will agree with the judgment of the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I just simply wished to know the opinion of the Senator. These are intricacies of the law which I thought it was well the Senator should inform us about.

Mr. DOLLIVER. All those questions have been discussed in the court and the laws between interstate and State commerce fairly well defined.

Mr. BACON. That would be the effect in this particular case.

Now, I want to ask the Senator another question, with his permission. Something was said in the early part of this debate to-day about whether both Federal and State courts would, under this Federal law, have jurisdiction in regard to injuries which arose in the operation of interstate trains.

I am not, Mr. President, entirely clear on that point. I presume there are decisions which determine it, but I have had no occasion to look into the matter. I have consulted with some of my brethren around me here, some of whom are eminent lawyers, and they are in doubt on the subject. Therefore I should like to know from the Senator from Iowa whether that question was entirely and conclusively considered by the committee, and whether the Senator is in a position to say definitely, as the result of that examination, what the law on that subject is?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I do not think that my opinion about that would give very much light upon the question which is before us.

Mr. BACON. I think it would.

Mr. DOLLIVER. But I do not hesitate to say that I understand that a citizen of Georgia can bring a suit in the State court of Georgia for the enforcement of his rights under this act, and would remain in the State court of Georgia unless the defendant exercised his right under the judiciary act and transferred the controversy to the Federal court.

Mr. BACON. The Senator thinks that a defendant, without a further act, would have the right to transfer to the Federal court?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I think he would have all the rights that he now has under the judiciary act.

Mr. BACON. But I am speaking about whether he would have the right to transfer by reason of the fact that the cause arose under a law of the United States.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I would defer a question like that to great and learned lawyers. I do not regard it as essential to the question here.

Mr. BACON. I want to explain to the Senator——

Mr. DOLLIVER. If the Senator from Georgia will not feel hurt about it, I would advise him not to cultivate too many objections to this bill, lest they might undermine the resolution he has expressed to cast his vote in favor of it.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have never expressed any such intention. The Senator from Iowa is mistaken about that. He never heard that from me. I am in favor of the principle involved in this bill, but I am not in favor of the enactment of a law of this kind by the Federal Government. I am not in favor of the Federal Government having power to destroy a law just like this proposed law that we now have in Georgia. I have too much regard for the interests of the railroad employees in Georgia to be willing to see the Georgia law destroyed which now protects those interests.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to know, is it not of some importance to consider whether or not the State courts in Georgia would observe the rules of evidence established by this proposed law, rather than the rules of evidence that they now have under the existing laws of Georgia? Would not that also be likely to be an embarrassing question?

Mr. BACON. I think there are a great many questions of that kind which would be embarrassing, but I want to say to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], in order that it may appear that I am not asking these questions idly, that the question which I have last propounded is one of intense interest to the laboring men in my State.

I will tell the Senator why. I am inclined to agree with the suggestion of the Senator that the State courts would have jurisdiction to administer this law, but I have not looked into it, and I am not prepared to say with certainty—but it is of immense importance that if they would not have it, and if it is possible to amend this bill so as to give it to them, that we should do it for this reason—I illustrate by my own State, but, of course, there are other States in a similar position. There are 146 counties in my State, and there is scarcely a county through which a railroad does not run. Under our law, in any county in that State in which an accident occurs, there is jurisdiction for the trial of that case; in other words, there is the opportunity for the injured employee to try his case close at home, where the witnesses can be had easily and without expense, and where it is convenient for him to try it.

If, on the contrary, he has to go to a Federal court to try it, he will, in some instances, have to go over 100 miles to attend that court. It is a matter of extreme importance, not only in that particular, but when he tries the case in the State court the expenses are small; the costs are small. If he loses his case in the first court he can, without expense of any material character, go to the appellate court to try his case. But if he has to go to the Federal court the costs are immense and almost prohibitory to him; and when it comes to the question of whether he shall go to an appellate court, perhaps in another State, the court of appeals, or ultimately, if you please, to come to the Supreme Court of the United States for the adjudication of his rights, the expenses are prohibitory to him. Therefore it is of immense importance that, if there is any doubt under the provisions of this bill as to that jurisdiction, it should be so amended that the jurisdiction should be given to the State courts, in order that parties may have the opportunity to avail themselves of it.

Now, I will illustrate, to show in what way that is regarded by the laboring men in my State—employees of railroad companies. I will state, first, that most of the railroads in my State have foreign charters and, under the diverse-citizenship clause, have the right and opportunity to transfer cases to the Federal court in case the amount involved exceeds $2,000. In almost every instance where the injury is of a small character the employee will bring his suit for $1,999, in order to get his case in the State court and in order to prevent the railroad company from having an opportunity to transfer it to the Federal court, where it would involve an expense which he can not well bear and where he does not have the same opportunity for convenient trial as he has in that case.

I state that for the purpose of showing that I am not asking these questions with a view to any factious opposition. I am not unfriendly to the purpose of the bill, but there are a great many law questions which arise in this case, and questions of practical operation, which make it a very serious matter, and one which I think ought to be very carefully examined into, and not one to be passed, as this is proposed to be passed this evening, without an opportunity for due consideration as to what amendments may be needed.

Mr. President, there are other questions that I am troubled about, but I dislike to trespass upon the time of the Senate.

I would like to ask another question, however, Mr. President. I should like to know if it has been considered by the committee, of which the Senator from Iowa is chairman, whether the fact that it is a liability dependent upon a Federal law of itself, without diverse citizenship, gives to either party the right of removal to a Federal court?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BACON. I do. I asked the question in the utmost good faith, because it was a matter that I have not had an opportunity to examine.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I am afraid the committee gave no consideration to that question, and my own experience in the Federal courts in recent years has been somewhat limited; but I am going to take the liberty of asking my friend, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], to answer that question.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I was otherwise occupied when the question was asked, and I do not know what the question was. I shall have to have it repeated.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The question was whether when a suit is brought in a State court under this act, to gain the advantage of this act it could be taken to a Federal court by the allegation that it was a question arising under an act of Congress.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. FORAKER. I should think, without stopping to examine the statute, that the cause would be removable on the ground suggested.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Without any other law?

Mr. FORAKER. On the ground that it is a case arising under the law of the United States.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But it is not included, if the Senator please, in the removal law.

Mr. FORAKER. I will say that I have not read the statute on that particular point. It would undoubtedly be removable on any statutory ground that might be prescribed.

Mr. BACON. If that is the case, it is important that we should have an amendment made to the bill. If the Senator from Ohio is correct in his judgment of the law—I express some doubt on the subject—if the Senator from Ohio is correct in his opinion of the law, then it would not at all depend on the amount involved, and no railroad employee could bring a suit in any State court for any minor injury without liability to removal to a Federal court, whereas if the proper amendment were put on the bill limiting it to $2,000, as in other cases, he could, for minor injuries at least, seek and obtain redress in State courts.

Mr. President, these are serious questions——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator mean to say that you can not go to a State court now?

Mr. BACON. I did not say so. The Senator from Ohio said so.

Mr. FORAKER. No; Mr. President, what I intended to say positively was that such a suit would be removable upon any ground provided by the Federal statute if that ground existed. I do not know the particular ground, except that which the Senator suggested. Whether or not that particular ground was provided in the statute of removal, I can not tell without looking at the statute. Senators about me have examined the statute, and I understand the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] can answer the question from the statute that he has before him.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia desires, I will read the pertinent portions of two sections of the statutes relating to the subject under consideration. The act of March 3, 1901, in so far as it is directly applicable, reads:

That the circuit courts of the United States shall have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several States, of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value of $2,000, and arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made, etc.

The section which relates to the removal of causes, in so far as it is applicable here, says:

Any other suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, of which the circuit courts of the United States are given jurisdiction by the preceding section and which are now pending or which may hereafter be brought in any State court, may be removed into the circuit court of the United States for the proper district by the defendant or defendants therein, being nonresidents of that State.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am reasonably familiar with the terms of that statute. It has been on the statute book for some time, in one form or another, and it has been amended since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor; but my inquiry was addressed to the question whether, under the terms of this particular bill and in view of the suggestion of the learned Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], that jurisdiction was given by reason of the fact that it arose under the powers conferred by the Constitution, which I say——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I made no such suggestion, Mr. President.

Mr. BACON. I understood the Senator made that suggestion in commenting upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON].

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Quite the reverse.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon; I misunderstood him.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think the question the Senator is asking about is pretty well settled; and I am surprised to hear the Senator suggest that under this proposed law a citizen of Georgia would not have the right to go into the State courts and stay there, if he wanted to, before he could get into the Federal courts at all.

Mr. BACON. I have not made any such suggestion. I have been, in the language of our distinguished friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who is not here now, "seeking light," and would be very glad to have some from the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose an employee of a railroad in North Carolina should bring a suit against a North Carolina domestic corporation for damages, and suppose a petition on the part of the railroad were filed suggesting that a Federal question was involved, would the case not be removed under this proposed statute?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly not; unless there was a question of diverse citizenship involved.

Mr. OVERMAN. I mean without regard to diverse citizenship or the amount involved.

Mr. BACON. I do not profess to be so familiar with this bill as to give any opinion in regard to that point. My object in rising was to try to get some information. I think, Mr. President, that the inquiries which have been made are sufficient to demonstrate the fact that the questions which are involved are very numerous and very grave, and I agree with Senators who think that the bill ought to be more carefully considered than it can possibly be considered this afternoon. I do not think, in a matter so far-reaching as this, that there should be action in a way which will leave it altogether uncertain what we have done or what we have not done, or what the effects of our action are to be.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I will offer an amendment without debating it. I was very much impressed by the argument of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], and as doubt has been suggested in regard to this matter, I should like to remove all doubt. It may be that no suit can be brought by a citizen of a State against a domestic corporation. Therefore I think we can settle it without endangering the bill by adopting the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, if the Senator from North Carolina will withhold the amendment for a moment, I will call the attention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to the provision of section 640 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that a suit brought against any corporation—may be removed for trial in the circuit court for the district where such suit is pending, upon the petition of such defendant, verified by oath, stating that such defendant has a defense arising under or by virtue of the Constitution or of any treaty or law of the United States.

That would seem to cover the case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At what point does the Senator from North Carolina wish his amendment to come in?

Mr. OVERMAN. At the end of the last section in the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 8, on page 4, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to be a cause for a removal from the State to the Federal court of any suit brought by a citizen of a State against a domestic corporation, or a suit by one citizen of a State against a foreign corporation joined with a citizen of the same State.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I showed a modest reluctance to settle the question of the statutory law, but I have spent a good many months lately studying the general Constitution of the country; and among other things that I made up my mind as reasonably certain is that it is not in accordance with our jurisprudence to create two classes of litigants, sending one into the courts under one statute and another under another, and I very greatly fear that if such an amendment were adopted the bill would be swamped in the constitutional interpretation of it. I therefore move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. TELLER. I do not desire to detain the Senate very long, but I want to call attention to a provision of the bill, and I should like to have the chairman of the committee explain to me why it is put in. It is the provision on page 1, commencing in line 13, as follows:

For the benefit of the surviving widow or husband and children of such employee; and, if none, then of such employee's parents; and, if none, then of the next of kin dependent upon such employee.

Mr. President, I myself supposed that it was a well-established principle that the distribution or inheritance of property depended entirely upon State laws and not upon the laws of the General Government. I should like to ask the chairman how this distribution will be made? This provision would not be in accordance with the laws of some of the States; I do not know how it is with all of them; but, Mr. President, it strikes me that the provision to which I have referred has nothing to do with the principle for which we are contending here. Therefore I think it ought to go out and the matter be left to the State courts.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I do not think there is anything wrong about that. That is the exact language of the act of 1906.

Mr. TELLER. I know it is; but that is one of the defects of that act.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I know; but that act ran the gantlet of criticism in the highest court, and that question was raised neither by the court nor by the great counsel who were engaged in the trial of that case.

Mr. TELLER. It did not get to the question of distribution and they could not raise it there very well. It was not considered. When the plaintiff gets his judgment, Mr. President, if he ever does—and he will always have some trouble to get it—then the State law should determine how it should be distributed. The States provide for that and provide the agencies, such as the surrogate court in New York, or, as we say in the West, the probate court. There is no machinery of the Federal Government by which that can be done.

I only call attention to this, Mr. President, to indicate that this bill, I think, has not been carefully examined and that we are pushing it through here to-night in great haste, as if there were no time to consider it, and all of the important questions which have been raised here have been but partially considered.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I move to lay the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to lay the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. I can not indicate the particular section which it should follow, but it is immaterial, as it will be an independent section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

That no action brought in a State court under this act shall be transferred to a Federal Court, except by reason of diverse citizenship.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it seems to me that is absolutely reasonable, and I hope the Senate will agree to that much.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa moves to lay the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to serve two purposes in rising. I desire to say in regard to the Roosevelt-Harriman letter, which I had read to the Senate, that I am responsible for the reading of that letter to the Senate, and that I would rather be responsible for the reading than for the writing of that letter. Now, sir, if that were a proper letter for the President of the United States to write to an "undesirable citizen," there certainly could be no impropriety in my having it read to this Senate. If that were an improper letter for the President to write to Mr. Harriman, then, sir, I am sorry that the President wrote the letter. That is my apology.

Now, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill at the close of section 3 by adding these words:

Provided, That all questions of fact relating to negligence shall be determined by the jury.

I desire to claim the floor to speak to that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator will be recognized as soon as the Secretary has stated the amendment. The amendment will now be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 3, on page 3, it is proposed to add the following:

Provided, That all questions of fact relating to negligence shall be determined by the jury.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, that amendment presents the vital distinction between the pending House bill and the Senate bill upon this subject. That amendment is a matter of vital importance to the efficacy of this measure. It is of vital consequence to the successful enforcement of this measure. The amendment raises this question, Shall all issues of fact relating to negligence be determined by the jury, or shall the Federal court have the power in effect to withdraw such causes from the jury and give a peremptory instruction in behalf of the defendant?

This measure has been attended with a considerable flourish of trumpets. It is being passed professedly in response to the demands of the laboring people of this country for remedial and protective legislation. For my part, I desire to carry out the demands and the desires of the laboring men in good faith. I am unwilling to hand them either a serpent or a stone. I have reasons to think, sir, that the laboring people of this country desire to have this clause incorporated in this bill; and, if it is not in it when they come to gather the fruit of this legislation, it will turn to ashes upon their lips.

I presume that everybody has more or less faith in the Federal courts. The laboring people of this country, however, are willing for a jury of their peers to determine their rights and their interests, and I presume that the railroads are willing to commit their rights and their interests to the same tribunal. For that reason I submit the amendment.

Mr. DOLLIVER. If the Senator will permit me, it will be remembered by the Senate that a similar amendment already has been offered and rejected by the Senate.

Mr. GORE. As I understand, the Senator from Iowa offered a section from the Senate bill as a substitute for this entire section in the House bill. There were other differences besides this, and perhaps the negative vote went off on the other propositions.

Mr. DOLLIVER. It will be recalled by those who have read the decision of the Supreme Court that their judgment as to the constitutionality of a similar clause in the old law of 1906 was expressly reserved. I have given a good deal of study to the question, and do not regard that section as essential. The truth is that the relation of the court and the jury in trials under our system is rather definitely fixed by the Constitution, which, in Article VII says:

In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise reexamined in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.

That appears to me to be a sufficient protection of the rights of litigants. If this were pending here as an original bill I would favor such a measure, but this is a House bill which needs only the favorable action of the Senate to become a law without further proceedings, and at the present stage of the session I very much prefer the friends of the bill to have it enacted rather than to have it perfected at the risk of being tied up in the closing hours of the session.

I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa moves to lay on the table the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

Mr. GORE. I should like to have the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I desire to announce my pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], and I withhold my vote.

Mr. CLAY (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. DEPEW (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. MCENERY].

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], which I will transfer to the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. FOSTER (when his name was called). In the absence of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], with whom I am paired, I will withhold my vote.

Mr. FRAZIER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GAMBLE (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as to pairs and transfers that I did on the last vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. BANKHEAD (when Mr. JOHNSTON'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON] is paired with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS].

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. WARNER]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when the name of Mr. PILES was called). The Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] during the afternoon was unavoidably called from the city because of illness in his family, and he desired that fact to be announced on the floor. As stated by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Washington stands paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I announce my general pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], who is absent from the Chamber. I withhold my vote.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 37, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—37.

Ankeny	Curtis	Gamble	Perkins
Beveridge	Dick	Guggenheim	Richardson
Bourne	Dillingham	Hale	Scott
Brandegee	Dixon	Hemenway	Smoot
Brown	Dolliver	Heyburn	Stephenson
Burkett	du Pont	Hopkins	Sutherland
Burrows	Flint	Kean	Wetmore
Carter	Foraker	Knox
Clapp	Frye	Long
Cullom	Gallinger	Nelson

NAYS—13.

Bacon	Culberson	Martin	Teller
Bankhead	Gary	Paynter
Borah	Gore	Simmons
Clarke, Ark.	McCreary	Taliaferro

NOT VOTING—42.

Aldrich	Depew	McEnery	Rayner
Allison	Elkins	McLaurin	Smith, Md.
Bailey	Foster	Milton	Smith, Mich.
Briggs	Frazier	Money	Stewart
Bulkeley	Fulton	Newlands	Stone
Burnham	Hansbrough	Nixon	Taylor
Clark, Wyo.	Johnston	Owen	Tillman
Clay	Kittredge	Overman	Warner
Crane	La Follette	Penrose	Warren
Daniel	Lodge	Piles
Davis	McCumber	Platt

So Mr. GORE'S amendment was laid on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendments proposed as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATORS FROM ALABAMA.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, a few days ago I gave notice that on the 11th of April, immediately following the routine morning business of that day, I would ask the Senate to consider resolutions commemorative of the life, character, and public services of the Hon. JOHN T. MORGAN and the Hon. EDMUND W. PETTUS, late Senators from the State of Alabama.

After conferring with Senators on both sides of the Chamber, it has been deemed best to postpone those resolutions until a week from next Saturday; that is, until April 18.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HALE. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

SITES FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that on Monday next, after the routine morning business, I wish to submit a few remarks on the bill (S. 122) authorizing the purchase of grounds for the accommodation of public buildings for the use of the Government of the United States in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 13, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 9, 1908.

[Continuation of the legislative day of Monday, April 6, 1908.]

The recess having expired, the House, at 11 o'clock and 30 minutes a. m., was called to order by the Speaker.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. LATTA, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On April 7, 1908:

H. R. 3822. An act for the relief of James Behan.

On April 8, 1908:

H. R. 1815. An act for the relief of the estate of D. S. Phelan; and

H. R. 13735. An act to correct the military record of Micaiah R. Evans.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 19355. An act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4172. An act providing for the erection of an addition to the court-house of the District of Columbia for the use of the court of appeals; and

S. 6105. An act for the relief of pensioners of the Metropolitan police fund.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 4172. An act providing for the erection of an addition to the court-house of the District of Columbia for the use of the court of appeals—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 6105. An act for the relief of pensioners of the Metropolitan police fund—to the Committee on Appropriations.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill to the conference committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to recommit the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill to the conference committee.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 62, noes 46.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for tellers.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi make the point of no quorum?

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the gentleman from New York will not make the point of no quorum and delay the business of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Mississippi ought to understand by this time that making a point of no quorum will expedite the business of the House.

The SPEAKER. The point of no quorum will get a rather more speedy proceeding.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make the point of order that notwithstanding the general rules of the House the point of no quorum being made is dilatory. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That there is no quorum in the House disables the House from doing business because there is no House present. Therefore, under the rule, the Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absentees, the Clerk will call the roll, and as many as are in favor of the motion will, when their names are called, answer "aye," and those opposed "no," and those present will answer "present."

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 249, nays 3, answered "present" 14, not voting 121, as follows:

For the session:
Mr. CURRIER with Mr. FINLEY.
Mr. KNOPF with Mr. WEISSE.
Mr. BENNET of New York with Mr. FORNES.
The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the bill (H. R. 17288) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, with Senate amendments, which amendments the Clerk will report.

The Senate amendments were read.

During the reading of the Senate amendments,

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. To make a parliamentary inquiry, if I may be allowed. I desire to know if any of these paragraphs are subject to debate? Can I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question?

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read that part of the rule which bears upon this matter now before the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

That immediately upon the adoption of this rule, and at any time thereafter during the remainder of this session, it shall be in order to take from the Speaker's table any general appropriation bill returned with Senate amendments, and such amendments having been read, the question shall be at once taken without debate or intervening motion on the following question: "Will the House disagree to said amendments en bloc and ask a conference with the Senate?" And if this motion shall be decided in the affirmative, the Speaker shall at once appoint the conferees without the intervention of any motion. If the House shall decide said motion in the negative, the effect of said vote shall be to agree to the said amendments.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House disagree to the Senate amendments en bloc and ask a conference with the Senate?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Did the Speaker state, Will the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask a conference with the Senate?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again state the question. Will the House disagree to said amendments en bloc and ask a conference with the Senate?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely thought the Speaker had left out part of the question; that is all.

Mr. SLAYDEN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, you will pardon some lack of familiarity with the rules, but if the House votes "no" on this proposition will the effect be to pass the bill?

The SPEAKER. If the House votes to agree to the Senate amendments, it would pass the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is there any opportunity under the rules to vote upon the several Senate amendments according to their merits or demerits, or will we be compelled to vote to disagree to all of them?

The SPEAKER. The Chair takes great pleasure in sending to the gentleman from Mississippi a Calendar. The gentleman will find on the first page of the Calendar all the information which the Chair has just caused to be read to the House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. The object of the parliamentary inquiry was to correct a misapprehension that might have been caused by the previous explanation. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House disagree to the Senate amendments en bloc and ask for a conference with the Senate?

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. FITZGERALD. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 140, noes 80.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers upon the proposition.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, in view of the vote, I make the point of order that that request is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Chair sustains the point of order? Then I ask for the yeas and nays. I had no idea the Chair would sustain the point of order. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 138, nays 116, answered "present" 17, not voting 116, as follows:

For balance of this day:

Mr. FOSS with Mr. GREGG.

On this vote:

Mr. LORIMER with Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi.

For the session:

Mr. BOUTELL with Mr. GRIGGS.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees:

Mr. HULL of Iowa, Mr. PARKER of New Jersey, and Mr. HAY.

THE FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. From the Speaker's table the Chair lays before the House the bill (H. R. 19355) making appropriation for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments. The Clerk will read the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House disagree to said amendments en bloc and ask a conference with the Senate?

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN (during the count). Mr. Speaker, to save time, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 142, nays 109, answered "present" 19, not voting 117, as follows:

Mr. GORDON. No, sir; I was in the Senate at the time. I was not in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I was present on the second call, and my name was not called.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and in his seat and listening when his name should have been called and failed to hear it?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I was, and did not hear it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the name of the gentleman.

The name of Mr. Cox of Indiana was called and he voted "no."

Mr. SHEPPARD. Am I recorded, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I was listening when my name should have been called.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman listening when his name should have been called and failed to hear it?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I was.

The SPEAKER. Call the name of the gentleman.

The name of Mr. SHEPPARD was called and he voted "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The Speaker announced the appointment of Mr. SMITH of Iowa, Mr. GRAFF, and Mr. SHERLEY as conferees.

PERSONNEL OF THE REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules, to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of Senate bill 24, and pass the bill with the committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to suspend the rules, discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the following bill, and pass the bill. The Clerk will report the bill as amended.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 24) to increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Revenue-Cutter Service.

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the passage of this act the President be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint in the Revenue-Cutter Service, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one captain commandant for a period of four years, who may be reappointed for further periods of four years each, who shall act as chief of the division of Revenue-Cutter Service, with the rank of a colonel in the Army and a captain in the Navy, and who shall have the pay and allowances of a colonel in the Army; six senior captains, who shall perform duty in connection with the construction of vessels and the inspection of their armament and crews and such other duties as the Secretary of the Treasury or the President may prescribe, each with the rank of a lieutenant-colonel in the Army and a commander in the Navy, and who shall each have the pay and allowances of a lieutenant-colonel in the Army; one engineer in chief, for a period of four years, who may be reappointed for further periods of four years each, with the rank of a lieutenant-colonel in the Army and a commander in the Navy, and who shall have the pay and allowances of a lieutenant-colonel in the Army; and six senior engineers, who shall perform duty in connection with the construction and inspection of the machinery of vessels and such other duties as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, each with the rank of a major in the Army and a lieutenant-commander in the Navy, and who shall each have pay and allowances of a major in the Army: Provided, That the position vacated by an officer appointed captain commandant or engineer in chief shall be filled by promotion according to existing law. That any officer who shall hereafter serve as captain commandant shall, when retired, be retired with the rank of captain commandant and with the pay of a colonel in the Army on the retired list, and that an officer whose term of service as captain commandant has expired may be appointed a senior captain and shall be an additional number in that grade, but if not so appointed, he shall resume the lineal position he would have held in his previous grade, as an additional number: Provided further, That any officer who shall hereafter serve as engineer in chief shall, when retired, be retired with the rank of engineer in chief and with the pay of a lieutenant-colonel in the Army on the retired list, and that an officer whose term of service as engineer in chief has expired may be appointed a senior engineer and shall be an additional number in that grade, but if not so appointed he shall resume the lineal position he would have held in his previous grade, as an additional number. Additional numbers in the grades of senior captain and senior engineer shall at no time exceed two in each grade on the active list.

SEC. 2. That the captain commandant shall be selected from the active list of line officers not below the grade of captain; that the six senior captains shall be made by promotion from the active list of captains in the order of seniority; that the engineer in chief shall be selected from the active list of engineer officers not below the rank of first lieutenant; that the six senior engineers shall be made by promotion from the active list of engineer officers of the rank of first lieutenant in the order of seniority. When a vacancy occurs in any of the grades created by this act, it shall be filled in accordance with the provisions of this section.

SEC. 3. That when the appointments herein provided are made the active list of captains in the Revenue-Cutter Service shall be reduced by six and the active list of engineer officers with the rank of first lieutenant by six, and the said lists shall remain thereafter at thirty-one and twenty-eight, respectively.

SEC. 4. That the examinations and requirements for promotion provided in section 8 of the act approved April 12, 1902, entitled "An act to promote the efficiency of the Revenue-Cutter Service," shall not be required for promotion to the grades created by this act.

SEC. 5. That any officer of the Revenue-Cutter Service with a creditable record who served during the civil war in the land or naval forces of the United States shall, when retired, have the rank and receive three-fourths of the duty pay and increase of the next higher grade; and the provisions of this section shall apply to officers of the said Service now on the retired list.

SEC. 6. That the captain now on the retired list who served as chief of the division of Revenue-Cutter Service for ten years and until March 26, 1905, shall have the rank and receive three-fourths of the duty pay and increase of the highest grade provided for in this act.

SEC. 7. That a constructor or surgeon, with the rank of first lieutenant, after fifteen years' service in the Revenue-Cutter Service shall have the pay and allowances of a captain.

SEC. 8. That the pay of the enlisted force of the Revenue-Cutter Service shall be increased 20 per cent over the pay that they are now receiving. That all warrant and petty officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service shall receive 10 per cent increase of pay for every five years of service as such warrant or petty officers, such increase not to exceed 40 per cent of the pay of their grade or rating: Provided, That no warrant or petty officer shall be appointed or rated as such without a suitable examination or period of probation to determine his fitness for his grade or rating. That an enlisted man or a warrant or petty officer who has served thirty years in the Service shall, upon suitable application, be placed on waiting orders and receive 75 per cent of the pay and increase of his grade or rating: Provided, That such enlisted man, warrant or petty officer may be assigned to such duties as he may be able to perform.

SEC. 9. That a third lieutenant or an engineer officer with the rank of third lieutenant who has served five years in his grade shall, upon passing the examination now required by law, be eligible to promotion to the next higher grade: Provided, That there shall be no increase in the total number of lieutenants nor in the total number of engineer officers below the rank of first lieutenant authorized by law: Provided further, That nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent promotions to fill vacancies as now provided by law.

SEC. 10. That engineer officers who now have or who may hereafter have the rank of captain, first lieutenant, second lieutenant, or third lieutenant in the Revenue-Cutter Service shall hereafter have the title of captain of engineers, first lieutenant of engineers, second lieutenant of engineers, and third lieutenant of engineers, respectively, and the titles of chief engineer, first assistant engineer, and second assistant engineer are hereby abolished. That precedence between line and engineer officers of the same rank shall be determined by length of continuous service as a commissioned officer.

SEC. 11. That an enlisted man upon first entering the Revenue-Cutter Service shall have credited to his account the sum of $45, and upon each subsequent enlistment the sum of $20, for uniform clothing, and such amount shall be paid to said enlisted man at the expiration of his term of enlistment if he has served a full term as prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury and has received an honorable discharge.

SEC. 12. That the presidents and recorders of Revenue-Cutter Service courts and commanding officers of vessels of the Revenue-Cutter Service be, and are hereby, authorized to administer oaths of allegiance and such other oaths as may be necessary for the proper conduct of said Service; and that commanding officers of vessels of the Revenue-Cutter Service be, and are hereby, authorized to administer oaths generally in Alaska.

SEC. 13. That the number of officers allowed in the grades of second lieutenant and third lieutenant and second lieutenant of engineers and third lieutenant of engineers is hereby increased five in each of said grades.

SEC. 14. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a second.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to a second being considered as ordered?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I shall feel compelled to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] will take their places as tellers.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important bill. I think it should be considered by a quorum of the House. It is evident that a quorum is not present, and I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. We have had a roll call, and it shows a marked increase over a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is some time ago.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 69.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I insist upon the point of order that I made that there is no quorum present. The vote just taken sustains the proposition that I made before.

Mr. MANN. In view of the attitude of the House, I desire to withdraw my motion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order that the motion having been seconded, the gentleman can not withdraw it without unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman can not withdraw it without unanimous consent, and I object to his withdrawing it.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors; the Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absent Members; those that are in favor of ordering a second will answer "yea," those opposed "nay," and those present and not voting will answer "present." The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The roll call is proceeding.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that. The vote is upon the question whether or not the motion shall be seconded?

The SPEAKER. Oh, precisely.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But many gentlemen did not understand that.

Mr. MANN. And many gentlemen who just voted "no" against ordering a second will now——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

The question was taken, and there were—ayes 170, nays 74, answered "present" 23, not voting 120, as follows:

Mr. HEPBURN with Mr. BURLESON.

Until Monday:

Mr. HULL of Iowa with Mr. SLAYDEN.

Balance of day:

Mr. STURGISS with Mr. SPIGHT.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. A second is ordered. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi to twenty minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a few years ago Congress passed a law providing for an increase in the efficiency of the Revenue-Cutter Service, and that law provided for the creation of a retired list in the Revenue-Cutter Service. Some gentlemen in the House who were here at that time will remember that I opposed that bill through two or three terms of Congress as vigorously as I could. In the end, however, it became a law and is the law now. In the course of the consideration of the bill I offered an amendment, which was accepted and agreed upon and became a part of the law, providing that there should be no increase in the number of commissioned officers in the Revenue-Cutter Service above the number then in the Service.

There were at that time, and are now, in the neighborhood of thirty-seven officers of each of the different grades, in no grade more than thirty-seven, and in some less than thirty-seven.

We are now constructing seven new revenue cutters and will have a considerably larger number of revenue cutters soon than we have ever had before. More than half the revenue cutters are now without the services of a captain, some of them are commanded by second lieutenants, there not being enough first lieutenants to command in every case. The present bill, in one of its aspects, seems to me absolutely necessary to be enacted into law, as it makes a slight increase in the number of officers. The bill provides for an increase of five second lieutenants, of five third lieutenants, of five second lieutenant engineers, and of five third lieutenant engineers.

That is one aspect of the bill. The Revenue-Cutter Service is authorized to pay the enlisted men of the Service the same wages as are paid to similar men in the merchant marine. The duties in the Revenue-Cutter Service, under the discipline in that Service, are much more arduous than in the merchant marine, and the result has been, and is now, that it is practically impossible to maintain a sufficient number of enlisted men in the Service to properly man the revenue vessels, and this bill authorizes the Revenue-Cutter Service to increase the pay of the enlisted men 20 per cent.

The longevity-pay system is now in force in the Revenue-Cutter Service as to the commissioned officers, but not as to the noncommissioned officers. It is desirable to have the warrant officers in the Revenue-Cutter Service equally efficient with the warrant officers in the naval service, and it has been thought that the easiest way, and most economical way, of keeping the warrant officers and enlisted men in the Service for a period of years is to introduce the longevity system of pay as to the warrant officers, and this bill contemplates that.

There are, Mr. Speaker, in the Revenue-Cutter Service between 225 and 250 commissioned officers. There are something over 1,500 men in the Service. The entire Service is presided over by a captain detailed from the line as chief of the division of the Revenue-Cutter Service. He is in charge of that division of the Government answering to one of the divisions either in the Army or in the Navy, and he receives no increase of rank and no increase of pay; he is simply one of the thirty-seven captains taken out from among the others and awarded the position.

Our committee has thought it was desirable, as the Senate and Secretary of the Treasury also have thought, to increase the rank and the pay of this one officer. We have made no great increase. In the other branches of the Service, in the Army and in the Navy, a similar officer would have the rank and pay of brigadier-general. In the bill we provide that the Chief of the Revenue-Cutter Service may be detailed from among the captains and serve for a period of four years, and while acting as Chief of the Service he shall have the rank and pay of colonel in the Army, the same rank and pay that an officer of the Army would have who was in charge of a regiment or a corresponding officer in the Navy.

In addition to that we have provided that of the number of captains in the Service—thirty-seven—six shall be called "senior captains" and shall have the rank and pay of a lieutenant-colonel in the Army. We have provided that of the thirty-four chief engineers in the Service, six shall be called "senior engineers" and have the rank and pay of a major. We have provided that the engineer in charge of the engineer service shall be detailed by the President and be called "engineer in chief" and that he shall have the rank and pay of a lieutenant-colonel in the Army. We have made no great changes. The rest of the changes apply primarily to the question as to precedence between the line and engineer officers.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, I have had no prejudice in behalf of the Revenue-Cutter Service. Gentlemen here will remember probably that I may have become unduly prejudiced against the Service. I know, at any rate, I gave considerable attention to the Service at the time of the fight before, and have ever since. I can say conscientiously that I believe now that the Revenue-Cutter Service is the best trained, the best disciplined, service on the sea that can be found anywhere in the world. [Applause.] We have most skillful navigators in the Revenue-Cutter Service; we have the best captains and other officers in charge of the ships who can be found anywhere. It should be remembered that entrance into the Revenue-Cutter Service is not by favor. Entrance to Annapolis is by favor, and entrance to West Point is by favor. Entrance into the Revenue-Cutter Service is absolutely on merit. All over the United States, whenever there are vacancies in that Service, examinations are held for appointment at the little school over here at Arundel, Md. At that place the men who secure the appointment are given a thorough training in the school, so that when they come out they are fairly proficient and go in at an older age than they do into the Navy or into the Army, with more advanced education than in the Army or Navy they are required to have. Through this school they come out prepared to take charge on the one side of the machinery in the engine rooms, and on the other side to take charge of the deck and charge of the vessel.

We do not in the Revenue-Cutter Service attempt to do what, in my judgment, is the impossible thing now attempted in the Navy, namely, to teach a boy of 16 years of age in four years all there is to know about navigation, gunnery, machinery, languages, diplomacy, and everything else conceivable. In the Revenue-Cutter Service we try to turn out of the school men who are able to navigate the vessel, on the one hand, and, on the other, men who are competent to go into the engine room where they belong and operate the machinery of the vessel. We make no great changes in this bill. There is no general increase of salaries in the bill. There is no proposition to increase the pay of the line officers except as I have mentioned.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What is the law now on the statute books in reference to the retirement of the Revenue-Cutter Service officers?

Mr. MANN. They are retired in the same way precisely that they are in the Army and Navy.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I notice a provision in this bill for the retirement of certain officers specified in there, evidently putting them on a different basis from other officers. I would like to know where the distinction is that is attempted to be made.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman refer to section 5?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it is section 5.

Mr. MANN. Section 5 of the bill places the officers now on the retired list who had service in the civil war on retired pay on the basis of the next higher grade, in the same way as has been applied to the Army and Navy.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What I want to know is on what basis are they retired now. Are they receiving any retired pay now?

Mr. MANN. They receive now three-fourths pay. It does not increase the amount of pay except as it increases the rank upon which they are retired one grade, and of course to that extent increases the pay. These men are all now on the retired list on three-fourths pay under existing legislation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And the bill promotes them a grade since they retired.

Mr. MANN. That is true.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And gives them the pay for the promoted grade.

Mr. MANN. That is true; and I will be very frank with the gentleman about it, as I always endeavor to be with the House. I think that feature of the bill to some degree is objectionable. I certainly would not have been willing to have it reported into the House if it were an original proposition, but the House having accepted, against the vote of myself and probably of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the principle of retired pay in the Revenue-Cutter Service, and having put that Service upon the same basis as the Army and Navy as to the principle of retired pay, I see no reason for making a distinction between the officers in the Revenue-Cutter Service who had civil war service and those officers in the Army and Navy who had civil war service, and that proposition has already been applied to them in the Army and Navy.

Mr. ADAIR. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. ADAIR. Not having had time to examine this bill carefully, do I understand the gentleman to say that the pay of the enlisted men is increased 20 per cent in this bill?

Mr. MANN. There is to be an increase of 20 per cent.

Mr. ADAIR. And that the increase in the pay of the officers will be due to the advancement in the ranks?

Mr. MANN. Purely. There is no increase in the pay of the different ranks.

Mr. ADAIR. No increase in the pay of the ranks.

Mr. MANN. Of the commissioned officers.

Mr. ADAIR. But it does advance the rank of the officers, which, in effect, increases the pay.

Mr. MANN. It advances the rank only as to one captain commandant, one engineer in chief, six senior captains, and six senior engineers.

Mr. BOWERS. Fourteen men, altogether.

Mr. KEIFER. Just one question. I notice the bill provides that there shall be placed to the credit of every enlisted man, I believe, at the time of his enlistment $45, and then later something else. Is that the law now with reference to enlistments in the Revenue-Cutter Service?

Mr. MANN. That is not the law now. That is applying to the Revenue-Cutter Service as to pay for clothing the same principle that is applied to the other branches of the military service.

Mr. KEIFER. Not in the same way?

Mr. MANN. Practically in the same way.

Mr. ADAIR. Just one other question. Can the gentleman tell what the pay of the enlisted men is at the present time?

Mr. MANN. The average pay is $33 a month.

Mr. BOWERS. Does that include the warrant officers?

Mr. MANN. I believe it does.

Mr. ADAIR. Under the provisions of this bill the increase pay would amount to about $6.60 a month for the enlisted men, but what would be the increased pay of the officers whose rank has been advanced?

Mr. MANN. The six senior captains will be increased from the pay of a major in the Army to the pay of a lieutenant-colonel.

Mr. ADAIR. I understand that; but the percentage of increase is much greater, is it not, in the pay of the officers than it is for the enlisted men by reason of their drawing much larger salaries?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken about that. The pay would be increased from $2,500 to $3,000 a year, a smaller percentage, or exactly the same percentage.

Mr. ADAIR. In other words, the increase to them would be $500 a year, while the increase to the enlisted men would be about $80 a year. In all of these increases the relative increase is always in favor of the officer as a rule.

Mr. MANN. I have just said to the gentleman the relative increase was not in favor of the officer. If the gentleman will figure it out he will see that it is not. The 20 per cent increase to the enlisted men is no smaller percentage of increase than the increase from $2,500 to $3,000.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Will the gentleman allow me to interject a statement at this point?

Mr. MANN. I will, if it will not take up much time.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri that——

Mr. MANN. He thinks you are from Missouri.

Mr. ADAIR. You have to show me.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I want to say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR] that so far as the enlisted men of the Revenue-Cutter Service are concerned the percentage of increase for the enlisted men of the Revenue-Cutter Service under this bill, which is a very meritorious bill, is much less than the percentage of increase of the pay of enlisted men of the Army and Navy.

Mr. ADAIR. That may be true; but nevertheless this fact remains, that the increase of the enlisted men is only about $80 per year and the increase of the officers is about $500 per year.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I consumed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MALBY). Eighteen minutes.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I did not demand a second nor did I demand a roll call upon this bill because I was opposed to its passage. I am not opposed to it. Independently of the other provisions of the bill, that provision which raises the pay of the enlisted men 20 per cent appeals to me in favor of the bill very strongly indeed. It is an arduous and fatiguing and sometimes a dangerous service, and it seems to me that these men are being paid too little and ought to have more.

I also demanded a second for the purpose of giving those who are opposed to the bill—some of them—an opportunity to discuss it and the House an opportunity to hear them. How much time have I exhausted in the remarks I have made, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One minute.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill not because I would not be willing to vote for a bill to increase the pay of the enlisted men 20 per cent. If that were the only proposition involved in the bill the chances are that nobody would be opposed to it, but to my mind, Mr. Speaker, this bill contains something else. It is creating, in a small way a retired or pension list of the civil employees of the Government. It will be treated as a precedent for future legislation. When we considered the proposition in the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress of retiring the officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service, we had the services of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] against that proposition. In a very admirable address on that occasion he pointed out that the Revenue-Cutter Service deserved no more at the hands of Congress than the Life-Saving Service, the Railway Postal Service, or the Light-House Service, all of which were engaged in hazardous work, all of whose employees endangered their lives, and that when we placed the revenue-cutter people on the retired list it was only a question of time when all these other departments would be knocking at the door of Congress. There is no use to attempt to conceal the fact that there are influences that work all the time in this House and out of it to create a civil pension roll here in Washington. My distinguished friend from Illinois in explaining his bill said nothing on this feature of it. Perhaps in the limited time at his command he is excusable, but I wish to call the attention of the House to the language in line 15, page 5:

> An enlisted man or a warrant or petty officer who has served thirty years in the service shall, upon suitable application, be placed on waiting orders and receive 75 per cent of the pay and increase of his grade or rating.

It is not called a civil pension. But what is it? In all candor and in all honesty, when you provide that a civil employee of the Government may be placed upon a waiting list at 75 per cent of his pay you mean to put him upon a pension list. That is what it means. These people who believe in a civil pension list can vote for the bill. I shall vote against it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I regard this bill as a meritorious measure. I think it ought to be passed. It has not only passed the Senate, but it has also the unanimous report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives. This bill is not an increase of pay bill, except that it increases the pay of the warrant officers, who are the petty officers, and the enlisted men, of the Revenue-Cutter Service. That is the main feature of the bill, as I understand it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I would rather not be interrupted just now; later on I will yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I would like to ask a question.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Very well.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Are you willing to retire people in all the Departments in Washington on 75 per cent pay?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I am not in favor of such a civil-service pension list, nor am I in favor of a general retirement bill for employees of the Government. But so far as retirement is concerned as to the Revenue-Cutter Service, that question has already been passed upon by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. As to the officers.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I must decline just now.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is on the point made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I have only five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. The Revenue-Cutter Service is not exclusively a civil institution and its roll is not purely a civil list. They fight in every war.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I am coming to that. Congress has already passed a bill providing for the retirement of the officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service. That is behind us, and that is not the question we are to pass upon to-day. The effect of this bill is to advance the rank of the chief of the Revenue-Cutter Service, who now has the rank of a captain, to that of a colonel in the Army, and certainly he merits that promotion, in my humble opinion; and it also gives the engineer in chief of the Revenue-Cutter Service the rank of a lieutenant-colonel. Then, there are some other slight promotions, mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. Now, with the exception of these promotions, which I believe are merited, the question of retirement, so far as the officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service are concerned, having already been disposed of by Congress, the material feature of this bill is the increase of the pay of the enlisted men and the petty or warrant officers.

Congress has already increased the pay of the enlisted men of the Army and the Navy, and the percentage of increase of the pay of the warrant or petty officers and the enlisted men of the Revenue-Cutter Service under this bill is much less than the increase in the pay of the enlisted men in the Army and Navy. The whole additional amount which this bill would carry per annum, as a charge upon the Federal Treasury, in order to give this, I think, merited increase in pay to these enlisted men and warrant officers, would be $200,000 per annum.

Mr. BOWERS. That is all the bill carries.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. That is all the bill carries, as my friend from Mississippi [Mr. BOWERS] says.

Now, what are the duties of this Revenue-Cutter Service? Why, Mr. Speaker, as laid down in the committee's unanimous report, the Revenue-Cutter Service is one of the most valuable branches of the Government service.

They enforce the revenue laws, they prevent smuggling, they suppress piracy, they search for wrecked and missing vessels, and derelicts in the pathways of ships on the high seas; they inspect the life-saving stations, and drill the life-saving crews; they enforce the laws as to seal and other fisheries in Alaskan waters, and have many other important duties.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will yield one minute more to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. They enforce the laws of the United States upon the high seas and navigable waters. Their duty extends not only to the Atlantic and Pacific and the Gulf coasts, but to the Arctic and Bering seas. The Revenue-Cutter Service is not only one of the most meritorious branches of the Government service, but it cooperates with the Navy and Army. The history of the wars of the United States involves in large measure the history of the Revenue-Cutter Service. In the war with Spain it was the revenue cutter Hudson, that, in the fight at Cardenas, rescued our torpedo boat the Winslow, of the Navy, when in imminent danger. And the Revenue-Cutter Service has been most gallant in every war of the country from Revolutionary times down to the war with Spain. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I can not make an argument in four minutes such as the provisions of this bill warrant. There are some meritorious features in this bill. I have no objection to the increased pay to men who are justified in receiving increased pay; but I have not heard one argument made by the gentleman from Illinois in charge of this bill, going to show any facts to sustain the proposition that the increased pay is needed. There is one radical defect in this bill, that I never intend to vote for as long as I am a Member of this House. It is absolutely undemocratic, it is absolutely un-American, it is absolutely against the spirit of our people and our Government, that is the provision creating a civil-service pension list. [Applause.] You can call it what you please; you can say it is "retirement pay," or it is "on waiting orders;" but the bill provides, and is intended to provide, that when a man has served thirty years in this service he can go out of the service, do no other work, and draw full pay.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Seventy-five per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It says 75 per cent, but the bill provides he shall be promoted to the next higher rank, and then draw three-fourths pay of that rank, which, as a rule, will probably retire him at the end of thirty years at full pay.

Mr. BOWERS. Does the gentleman insist that that which he has just stated applies to the enlisted men?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Certainly it does.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly it does.

Mr. BOWERS. Will you kindly state at what portion of the bill that is provided?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will read it. I have but four minutes, but I want the House to understand it, if the gentleman will allow me:

That an enlisted man or a warrant or petty officer who has served thirty years in the service shall, upon suitable application, be placed on waiting orders and receive 75 per cent of the pay and increase of his grade or rating.

Now, what can that mean but that he shall be promoted? And if he is retired on the next higher grade and receives 75 per cent of the salary of the next higher grade it will amount to his being retired practically on full pay. Now, if that does not create a civil pension list I do not know what it does. They say that these men collect the revenue and that they sometimes have to fight. Why, the United States marshals collect the revenue and they sometimes have to fight. They say it is a dangerous business. Why, the men who carry the mails on the railroads throughout the country are engaged in a far more dangerous service, and the number of deaths and accidents among them are far greater than they are in the Revenue-Cutter Service. The hardships of their lives are greater. If you are going to put these men, by Democratic votes, on a service-pension list then you may as well open the door and say that you will pension every deputy marshal who is injured when collecting the revenue and that you are going to put on the pension list or retired list every railroad mail clerk that receives injuries or serves in the service a certain number of years. I say that this bill is vicious in that respect, that it is undemocratic, un-American, and, as under the procedure of this House we are unable to amend the bill and consider it in any other way, unless we vote for it as a whole, I say it is our duty to vote it down now, until the Republican party are willing to bring it before this House in a form in which we can offer amendments to it and eradicate the vicious portions of the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Speaker, so far as I have heard any objections to this bill they are urged only against that portion which might be designated as the "retirement feature," rather than to any other provision. I believe that it is pretty generally conceded that it is fair and just that the rank of the senior and commanding officer of this Service should be increased from that which he now holds to a rank corresponding to that of colonel. Certain it is that by comparison with the other services of this Government that increase is fair and right, because the Marine Corps, which has practically the same number of officers and the same number of enlisted men as the Revenue-Cutter Service, has as its chief officer a brigadier-general. I have heard no serious objection against those provisions of the bill which increase the grade of the chief engineer, of the six senior captains, and six senior engineers one grade each. The work of this Service is arduous and important. To quote from the report on this bill:

The Revenue-Cutter Service is the police arm of the Government at sea. It is the strong arm of the Treasury Department upon the waters. In time of peace it is constantly active and energetic. It is always busy. When the sea is calm it is attending to its ordinary duties of protecting the customs, inspecting ships, attending to anchorage grounds, patrolling the coast, etc. In time of storm or bad weather at sea, it puts out to be ready to find vessels in distress and render them prompt and needed aid. It keeps its vigilant eye on the coast both along the Atlantic, the Gulf, and the Pacific, and also at Porto Rico, Hawaii, Alaska, and the Great Lakes. The record of its services on the coast of Alaska and its succor to icebound vessels and their crews constitutes a history of heroism and bravery rarely equaled and never excelled. It is the guardian of the fur-seal fisheries and their only protection from prompt destruction.

The only point made against it, as I said a moment ago, is as to the retired list. Now, as to the officers of the Service, that retired list is a matter of existing law, and to retire them as proposed by this bill merely carries out the provisions of the existing law and it puts them merely on a parity with the naval and military services of the United States in the matter of retirement.

Now, I come to the question of the enlisted men, and I want to be fair with the House and say that the words to which the gentleman from Alabama called my attention, the concluding words, as to retirement of enlisted men "and increase of his grade or rating," had escaped me up to the time that he read them. I confess that I do not understand them, but I do not believe, upon a cursory examination of them, that they are sufficient to warrant a retirement at an increased or advanced grade. I believe that that language as it now is in this bill is entirely too indefinite and will be held to be entirely insufficient to retire any enlisted man or warrant officer at an advanced grade.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. But it will retire them.

Mr. BOWERS. Oh, yes.

Mr. GARRETT. And will retire them on pay.

Mr. BOWERS. Oh, yes; they will be retired on 75 per cent of their pay.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. And would it not create a civil pension list?

Mr. BOWERS. No. If I believed this was creating a civil pension list, I would never vote for it as long as I live; but I regard this Service as a part of our fighting establishment. It is at least a semimilitary or more correctly speaking a branch of our naval force.

Mr. ADAMSON. They have always fought in all our wars.

Mr. BOWERS. Always. They fought in the Revolutionary war, in the war of 1812, in the war between the States, and in the Spanish-American war. This Service has taken part in all our wars and is virtually a part of our military and naval establishment.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Everybody fought.

Mr. LANDIS. Did not the enlisted men fight?

Mr. BOWERS. Certainly.

Mr. LANDIS. And if you are going to retire the officers on one grade higher, why not permit the enlisted men to be retired on one grade higher?

Mr. BOWERS. I confess that argument strikes me with force, but I was trying to meet the point made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and those gentlemen who seemed to find something in it. I do not believe it would warrant it, but, assuming that it does, I do not see any good reply to the inquiry which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] has put to me. I am advised, however, that the language I have read does not contemplate retirement at any advanced grade, but refers only to longevity pay.

Mr. LANDIS. I would not vote for the bill if I did not think it did warrant that construction.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOWERS. Can the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] yield to me a minute or two?

Mr. MANN. I only have two minutes remaining.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentlemen are mistaken in thinking that this bill creates a civil retirement list or a civil pension list. Congress has already adopted the policy of a retirement list in the Revenue-Cutter Service, and all that this bill does in that direction is to give to the enlisted men and the warrant officers the same footing that the commissioned officers now have. Do the gentlemen from South Carolina and Alabama propose to give a retired list to the commissioned officers and refuse it to the warrant officers? Let them answer by their votes on that question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman answer by his vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman asked me a question.

Mr. MANN. I say, answer by your vote. If the gentleman proposes to make a distinction between the commissioned officer and the enlisted man, let him vote "no." If he wants to put the enlisted man and the warrant officer upon the same footing as the commissioned officer, he will be compelled to vote "aye."

Mr. ADAIR. Does this bill do that?

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be interrupted in the two minutes that I have.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MANN. That is all there is to the voluntary retired list. The arguments which the gentlemen make are very good ones. They are copied from the arguments which I made to the House six years or four years ago.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. You made a better speech then than you are making now.

Mr. MANN. After hearing my argument then Congress took the other position, and, having taken the other position, I am only following it.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ADAIR. I would like to have the gentleman from Illinois state——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has no more time; debate is closed, and the question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill as amended.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 112, noes 32.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will take notice that there is no quorum present, and the Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absentees, the yeas and nays are ordered, and those in favor of the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill will, when their names are called, vote "aye," those opposed "no," and those present will answer "present," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 183, nays 57, answered "present" 22, not voting 125, as follows:

For the rest of the week:

Mr. HILL of Connecticut with Mr. SHACKLEFORD.

Mr. ACHESON with Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded and the doors were opened.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I present the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill, and I move to suspend the rules and adopt the report.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York desire to include in that a request that the statement be read?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 15219, an act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 21, 22, 23, 24, 52, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 68, 69, 73, 75, 85, 94, 99, and 100.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 18, 19, 20, 25, 26, 29, 30, 32, 34, 36, 37, 40, 41, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 67, 77, 78, 80, 82, 83, 86, 87, 89, 91, 93, 102, and 104, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert:

"The Secretary of the Interior shall take possession of all buildings on lands belonging to the Five Civilized Tribes, now or heretofore used for governmental, school, or other tribal purposes, together with the furniture therein and the land appertaining thereto, and appraise and sell the same at such time and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe and deposit the proceeds, less expenses incident to the appraisement and sale, in the Treasury of the United States, to the credit of the tribes respectively owning the said land and improvements, and immediately after any such sale patents for the realty thus sold shall be made and delivered in the same manner as now provided by law for other tribal property: Provided, That when practicable preference right shall be given to the State, counties, and municipalities of Oklahoma to purchase said lands and improvements at the appraised value: And provided, That pending such appraisement and sale the Secretary of the Interior may temporarily lease said buildings and lands for the benefit of the tribes respectively to which they belong."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2, after the word "and," strike out the words "purchase of;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and correct the total so as to read: "In all, two million one hundred and fifteen thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 17: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert:

"That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby authorized to send a special Indian agent, or other representative of his Office, to visit any Indian tribe for the purpose of negotiating and entering into a written agreement with such tribe for the commutation of the perpetual annuities due under treaty stipulations, to be subject to the approval of Congress; and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall transmit to Congress said agreements with such recommendations as he may deem proper."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "ninety" and insert in lieu thereof the word "eighty-five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 28: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 4 strike out the word "may" and insert in lieu thereof the word "shall;" in the same line strike out the words "from this" and in line 5 the word "appropriation;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 31: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of said amendment add the following: "Provided, That this appropriation shall be so expended as to make further appropriation for this purpose unnecessary;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 33: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "reservation," in line 10, add: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be available until the proper officer of the Indian Bureau shall investigate and report that the work contemplated can be completed for the amount herein appropriated;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 35: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert:

"That the land in the following subdivisions now embraced in the Coeur d'Alene Indian Reservation in Idaho, to wit: Sections 1, 2, and 12, township 46 north, range 4, west, Boise meridian; sections 35 and 36, township 47 north, range 4 west, Boise meridian; all of those portions of sections 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, township 46 north, range 3 west, Boise meridian, lying south and west of the St. Joe River in said township; all of those portions of sections 31 and 32, township 47 north, range 3 west, Boise meridian, lying south and west of the St. Joe River in said township is reserved and withdrawn from allotment and settlement, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to convey any part thereof to the State of Idaho to be maintained by said State as a public park; said conveyance to be made for such consideration and upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe. The proceeds of such sale shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States for the use and benefit of the Coeur d'Alene Indians in such manner as Congress shall hereafter prescribe."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 38: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2, after the word "authorized," insert the words "in his discretion;" and in line 6, after the word "purchase," strike out the words "in his discretion;" in line 9, after the word "Iowa," strike out the balance of said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 39: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 39, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2, after the word "to," strike out the words "use and;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 43: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 43, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "conclusive," in line 10, insert: "Provided, That the expense thereof shall be paid out of the moneys found due said Indians in said cause;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 51: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 51, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1, after the word "implements," insert the words "other equipment;" in line 9, after the word "Interior," insert the words "Provided, That said expenditures shall be made;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 70: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 70, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 strike out the word "six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 71: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 71, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert the following: "For construction of concrete walk, driveways, and grading, $2,500;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 72: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 72, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 strike out the word "twenty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "six;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 74: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 74, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 strike out the word "five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 76: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 76, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and correct the total so as to read: "In all, $36,700;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 79: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 79, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2, after the word "Jack," insert the words "Choctaw allottees;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 81: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 81, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 strike out the words "and directed" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in his discretion." At the end of said amendment add: "Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, in his discretion, to pay, upon the surrender of the note hereinafter described, out of the above sum appropriated for the Sac and Fox Indians, to Helen Pennock, the widow and surviving heir of William Pennock, the sum of $600, in full settlement of a promissory note given by Mo-ko-ho-ko and Ke-waquah, chiefs of the Sac and Fox Indians, and Ketch-e-Cush, a councilman;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 84: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 84, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of proposed amendment, and on page 36, in line 21, after the word "patents," strike out "and conveying," and in line 22 strike out the word "same;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 88: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 88, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert:

"That contracts heretofore or hereafter made by and between persons stricken by the Secretary of the Interior from the final rolls of the Five Civilized Tribes and attorneys employed by them to secure their restoration to said rolls shall be valid and enforcible when approved by the Secretary of the Interior in their original or in such modified form as he may deem equitable, and not otherwise; and such contracts as are approved as herein provided, when recorded in the county where such land is located, shall be a lien in the event of the restoration of such persons to the rolls against allotted lands or tribal funds of the persons so restored to or given rights upon said rolls."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 90: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 90, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay out of the Chickasaw fund to D. H. Johnson, governor of the Chickasaw Nation, compensation for his services as such governor, at the rate of $1,500 per annum from March 4, 1906, so long as he shall legally serve as such governor."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 92: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 92, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert in lieu thereof: "and the Secretary of the Interior is directed to so disburse this appropriation as to complete said work by July 1, 1909;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 95: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 95, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 96: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 96, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of said amendment strike out the word "five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "two;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 98: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 98, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert:

"That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is authorized and directed to invite proposals for the construction of a gravity water system for the Rapid City School to be supplied from the springs located on the school farms, said bids to cover construction of suitable reservoir and laying of a 6-inch main thereon to said school buildings and grounds, and such minor and collateral piping as may seem necessary, and to report thereon to Congress."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 101: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 101, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert the following:

"The Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby authorized and directed to expend so much of the trust funds of the Ute Indians, not exceeding $75,000, now in the United States Treasury, as in his judgment may be necessary to prevent want and suffering among the Absentee Utes, and the amount so expended for each individual Absentee shall be made a matter of record to be charged against and deducted from the share said Absentee may be entitled to receive when the trust funds of the Utes are allotted and distributed to the members of the tribe."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 103: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 103, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On line 8 of said amendment strike out "Uinta" and insert "Uintah."

Transpose entire amendment to page 48 and place after amendment 101; and the Senate agree to the same.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I will occupy but a moment of the present time to explain that the conference report now presented and which has been read is identical with the report which was published in the RECORD two weeks ago on Monday, except in reference to amendment No. 88. That amendment, by an inadvertence, was so drawn that it apparently validated contracts made between attorneys and claimants for title to certain tribal lands, whether the contracts were approved by the Secretary or not. It was not the intention of the conferees to make any such provision, and it was because of the apparent effect of that proviso that I asked this morning that the conference report be sent back to the conferees, and we have now presented a new amendment, No. 88, which makes it clear beyond question that such contracts are validated only as are approved of by the Secretary, either in their original form or in such modified form as the Secretary of the Interior deems equitable. Otherwise the report is identical with that which has been in the hands of every Member of the House for the past two weeks. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the motion to suspend the rules and agree to this conference report, not that I am opposed to the bill or to the report of the committee, but because I am opposed to this side of the House contributing votes to enable that side of the House to pass anything under the special rules that have been adopted. If the motion to suspend the rules and agree to this conference report is voted down, the effect will be to compel the printing of this report in the RECORD, as provided by the rules of the House; then it will be in order under the rules, in an orderly and proper and decent manner, to call up this report for consideration at any time, and the House will have an opportunity to agree to the report. The Committee on Rules has brought in a number of special rules, not for the purpose of expediting the business of the House, but in order to embarrass and coerce the minority of the House to do the will of the majority.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the leader of the Republican majority, announced last week that the majority of the House would do what business it pleased, in its own way, and at its own sweet will. Mr. Speaker, the majority will have an opportunity to carry out that programme without votes from this side of the House. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, and that side of the House will be the gander on this occasion. We shall see now how our Republican friends like special rules; we shall see how the application of the gag rule will delight the Republican Members of the House. Let us see how they will appreciate having the Committee on Rules abrogate all of the rules of the House that they desire and vote the rest of the House like a lot of sheep. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, how many Members on that side of the House read the very excellent speech printed in the RECORD on the 23d day of March by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. He paid a great compliment to the membership of this House. He said the trouble was that very few, practically none of the Members, knew anything about the rules; and he said that after he had insisted, on the opening day of the session, upon the majority Members of the House voting for the rules which he himself declares they know nothing about. The gentleman has complained that the minority has been filibustering. Oh, the gentleman from Pennsylvania knew that we have not been filibustering. He was here in the past when the House was in a filibuster. The rules provide that pending the adoption of the report from the Committee on Rules one motion to adjourn is in order. No Member on this side of the House has attempted to waste the time of the House by having a roll call on a motion to adjourn pending the adoption of any one of the several reports made by the Committee on Rules. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The minority Members here have certain rights which, unfortunately, as Members on that side of the House now think, were preserved to them by the men who formulated the Constitution under which this country exists. Exercising their constitutional rights, the minority Members have simply asked that the majority take the time to remain here to prosecute the public business; and they can be compelled to remain here only by forcing them to vote on these questions.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I just want a few minutes more. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] announced two things as part of the programme that would be followed by the minority Members of the House. One was that he would exercise his constitutional right to have a roll call upon certain matters. The other was that he would object to business being done by unanimous consent. That announcement was made after the gentleman from Pennsylvania put his very excellent speech in the RECORD. I shall read just what the gentleman from Pennsylvania said:

> There is no doubt that a great many measures of questionable character are passed by unanimous consent——

The gentleman from Pennsylvania said that, although the Speaker carefully scrutinizes every bill that is brought to him before he gives recognition for unanimous consent—

> Members can not keep run of all bills reported and are loath to object, both because of ignorance of the merits of the particular measure proposed and because they may have measures of their own to be considered, and they fear a reciprocity of objection. In a majority of cases the only real intelligent objection made to measures proposed for unanimous consent is that made by the Speaker, who has had opportunity to examine, as was his duty, the bill.

And yet in spite of that statement the gentleman from Pennsylvania insists that under the practice of legislating by unanimous consent, in spite of the scrutiny of the Speaker, many very objectionable measures pass. After reading that statement over carefully the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] decided that he would protect the Speaker against himself. [Applause on the Democratic side.] No more "very objectionable measures" will pass in that way. The rules of the House provide the manner in which legislation can be enacted; not since this Congress convened last December has there been a call of the committees of the House for the consideration of bills upon the Calendar. Stop legislation by unanimous consent and do not abrogate the rest of the rules that are still in existence, and perhaps, perhaps, unless the Committee on Rules has another session overnight, some time before the Cnogress adjourns it may be possible to have the committees called and to have bills considered in an orderly, proper manner. Mr. Speaker, nobody here has ever heard me protest against the rules of this House. I have some fair conception of them; I believe that within certain limits they do enable business to be transacted in an orderly manner, but it is the brutal exercise of the power, unjustifiably conferred by those rules upon the Committee of Rules which creates all the abuse against which we complain. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I hope this side of the House will defeat this motion and compel business to be done in an orderly way. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to address the House briefly upon the conference report on the bill before it. As a member of the conference committee I am in favor of the adoption of the report. We found to-day in our last conference with the Senate conferees but one matter of disagreement between the two Houses, and that is the eighty-eighth amendment, put upon the bill by the Senate, which I desire to read, and which is as follows:

> That contracts heretofore or hereafter made by and between persons stricken by the Secretary of the Interior from the final rolls of the Five Civilized Tribes, and attorneys employed by them to secure their restoration to said rolls, shall be valid and enforcible when approved by the Secretary of the Interior in their original or in such modified form as he may deem equitable, and not otherwise; and such contracts as are approved as herein provided when recorded in the county where such land is located shall be a lien, in the event of the restoration of such persons to the rolls against allotted lands of tribal funds of the persons so restored to or given rights upon said rolls: Provided, That the name of no person stricken from the final roll by the Secretary of the Interior shall be restored to said roll who was not originally entitled under the law to be enrolled.

This amendment was made necessary because many contracts had been made between attorneys in the Indian Territory and persons who are entitled to enrollment, and have had, or are entitled to have, lands allotted to them under the laws enacted heretofore by Congress, and it seems there were no means by which the attorneys could secure their fees unless there could be a lien established against the land, and it was this amendment that called us—the conferees of the House and the Senate—together again on this, the annual Indian appropriation bill; and when we met to-day this is the report we have made, it being unanimously agreed upon and signed by the conferees. I believe, with this amendment reported by us to the House, that the bill should pass.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I will take just a minute. My honored colleague from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], formerly a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs and a most admirable Member of the House, always doing his full share of the work, who has seemingly of late made a special study of the rules, and made that study with considerable care and success, it seems to me, says that he admires the rules, and yet, Mr. Speaker, for the past ten minutes he has been continuously violating the rules, which he must know and does know well, because nobody could know better than the gentleman from New York, nobody does know better than the gentleman from New York that he was in order only, Mr. Speaker, in discussing the conference report, and if he made allusion to the conference report after the first sentence I failed to hear it.

Now, the theory of the rule, Mr. Speaker, that a conference report must be printed in the RECORD before it is acted upon in the House is that no conference report ought to be acted upon without every Member of the House having the fullest opportunity to understand everything that is contained therein. Conference reports, of course, are more or less complicated. This particular bill had 104 amendments. It goes without saying that outside of the members of the conference committee, with the single reading at the desk all the Members of the House can not at once comprehend the full meaning of every amendment, and, therefore, a Republican Congress provided by its rules that a conference report must be presented and printed in the RECORD over night before it should be acted upon.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this particular conference report was presented two weeks ago last Monday and printed in the RECORD, so that it was entirely possible for every Member of the House to commit every word of it to heart before now, and any Member who does not understand fully every provision of every amendment is himself to blame, because it has been before him in print all of this time, not only in the RECORD, but as a separate document in the document room, all except this single amendment, No. 88, which my colleague from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] has just read and which I attempted in my feeble way to explain in the moment which I took at the beginning of this discussion, and which changes the original amendment as presented in the RECORD two weeks only in this particular, that it now makes clear and certain that we do not intend to validate any contract made between an Indian and attorney until that contract has been scrutinized by the Secretary of the Interior and approved by him. That was the intent of the original provision. My distinguished friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] called my attention to the fact, when I returned after an absence of a couple of weeks from the House, that seemingly the amendment did not do what it intended, and on careful reading of it I concluded the gentleman from New York was right. And so we have to-day been back to conference and made it perfectly clear that the amendment does exactly what we intended it to do, to wit, compel every contract, before it shall be validated, to be scrutinized and approved by the Secretary of the Interior. That is the only change there is from the report as presented two weeks ago, and which has been within the reach of every single Member of the House from that minute down to the present. Now, I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided.

The SPEAKER. On this vote 101 have voted in the affirmative and 75 have voted in the negative, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absent Members, as many as are in favor will answer "yea," and as many as are opposed will answer "nay," those present and not voting will answer "present," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 133, nays 97, answered "present" 20, not voting 137, as follows:

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the conference report and the accompanying statement to be printed in the RECORD.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT NO. 1417.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15219) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 21, 22, 23, 24, 52, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 68, 69, 73, 75, 85, 94, 99, and 100.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 18, 19, 20, 25, 26, 29, 30, 32, 34, 36, 37, 40, 41, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 67, 77, 78, 80, 82, 83, 86, 87, 89, 91, 93, 102, and 104, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out all of said amendment and insert:

"The Secretary of the Interior shall take possession of all buildings on lands belonging to the Five Civilized Tribes, now or heretofore used for governmental, school, or other tribal purposes, together with the furniture therein and the land appertaining thereto, and appraise and sell the same at such time and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and deposit the proceeds, less expenses incident to the appraisement and sale, in the Treasury of the United States, to the credit of the tribes respectively owning the said land and improvements, and immediately after any such sale patents for the realty thus sold shall be made and delivered in the same manner as now provided by law for other tribal property: Provided, That when practicable preference right shall be given to the State, counties, and municipalities of Oklahoma to purchase said lands and improvements at the appraised value: And provided, That pending such appraisement and sale the Secretary of the Interior may temporarily lease said buildings and lands for the benefit of the tribes respectively to which they belong."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 17: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert:

"That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby authorized to send a special Indian agent, or other representative of his office, to visit any Indian tribe for the purpose of negotiating and entering into a written agreement with such tribe for the commutation of the perpetual annuities due under treaty stipulations, to be subject to the approval of Congress; and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall transmit to Congress said agreements with such recommendations as he may deem proper."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "ninety" and insert in lieu thereof the words "eighty-five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 28: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 4 strike out the word "may" and insert in lieu thereof the word "shall." In the same line strike out the words "from this" and in line 5 the word "appropriation;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 31: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of said amendment add the following: "Provided, That this appropriation shall be so expended as to make further appropriation for this purpose unnecesary;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 33: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: After the word "reservation," in line 10, add:

"Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be available until the proper officer of the Indian Bureau shall investigate and report that the work contemplated can be completed for the amount herein appropriated."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 35: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert:

"That the land in the following subdivisions now embraced in the Coeur d'Alene Indian Reservation in Idaho, to wit: Sections one, two, and twelve, township forty-six north, range four west, Boise meridian; sections thirty-five and thirty-six, township forty-seven north, range four west, Boise meridian; all of those portions of sections two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten, and eleven, township forty-six north, range three west, Boise meridian lying south and west of the Saint Joe River in said township; all of those portions of sections thirty-one and thirty-two, township forty-seven north, range three west, Boise meridian, lying south and west of the Saint Joe River in said township is reserved and withdrawn from allotment and settlement, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to convey any part thereof to the State of Idaho to be maintained by said State as a public park, said conveyance to be made for such consideration and upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe. The proceeds of such sale shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States for the use and benefit of the Coeur d'Alene Indians in such manner as Congress shall hereafter prescribe."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 38: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2, after the word "authorized," insert the words "in his discretion," and in line 6, after the word "purchase," strike out the words "in his discretion" In line 9, after the word "Iowa," strike out the balance of said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 39: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 39, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2, after the word "to," strike out the words "use and;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 43: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 43, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "conclusive," in line 10, insert "Provided, That the expense thereof shall be paid out of the moneys found due said Indians in said cause;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 51: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 51, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1, after the word "implements," insert the words "other equipment;" in line 9, after the word "Interior," insert the words "Provided, That said expenditures shall be made;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 70: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 70, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 strike out the word "six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 71: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 71, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert the following: "For construction of concrete walk, driveways, and grading, $2,500;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 72: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 72, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 strike out the word "twenty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "six;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 74: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 74, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 strike out the word "five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 79: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 79, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2, after the word "Jack," insert the words "Choctaw allottees;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 81: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 81, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2, strike out the words "and directed" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in his discretion." At the end of said amendment add:

"Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, in his discretion, to pay, upon the surrender of the note hereinafter described, out of the above sum appropriated for the Sac and Fox Indians, to Helen Pennock, the widow and surviving heir of William Pennock, the sum of six hundred dollars, in full settlement of a promissory note given by Mo-ko-ho-ko and Ke-wa-quah, chiefs of the Sac and Fox Indians, and Ketch-e-Cush, a councilman."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 84: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 84, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of proposed amendment, and on page 36, in line 21, after the word "patents," strike out "and conveying," and in line 22 strike out the word "same;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 88: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 88, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert in lieu thereof:

"That contracts heretofore or hereafter made by and between persons stricken by the Secretary of the Interior from the final rolls of the Five Civilized Tribes, and attorneys employed by them to secure their restoration to said rolls, shall be valid and enforceable when approved by the Secretary of the Interior in their original or in such modified form as he may deem equitable and not otherwise; and such contracts as are approved as herein provided, when recorded in the county where such land is located shall be a lien, in the event of the restoration of such persons to the rolls against allotted lands or tribal funds of the persons so restored to or given rights upon said rolls."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 90: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 90, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay out of the Chickasaw fund to D. H. Johnson, governor of the Chickasaw Nation, compensation for his services as such governor, at the rate of fifteen hundred dollars per annum from March fourth, nineteen hundred and six, so long as he shall legally serve as such governor."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 92: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 92, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert in lieu thereof ", and the Secretary of the Interior is directed to so disburse this appropriation as to complete said work by July first, nineteen hundred and nine;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 95: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 95, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 96: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 96, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of said amendment strike out the word "five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "two;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 98: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 98, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert:

"That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is authorized and directed to invite proposals for the construction of a gravity water system for the Rapid City School to be supplied from the springs located on the school farms, said bids to cover construction of suitable reservoir and laying of a 6-inch main thereon to said school building and grounds, and such minor and collateral piping as may seem necessary, and to report thereon to Congress."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 101: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 101, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert the following:

"The Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby authorized and directed to expend so much of the trust funds of the Ute Indians, not exceeding $75,000, now in the United States Treasury, as in his judgment may be necessary to prevent want and suffering among the Absentee Utes, and the amount so expended for each individual absentee shall be made a matter of record to be charged against and deducted from the share said absentee may be entitled to receive when the trust funds of the Utes are allotted and distributed to the members of the tribe."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 103: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 103, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On line 3 of said amendment, strike out "Uinta" and insert "Uintah." Transpose entire amendment to page 48 and place after amendment 101; and the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The Senate made 104 amendments to the bill and added to the amount appropriated, in round figures, $1,800,000. In conference the Senate has agreed to recommend receding from twenty-six amendments and has consented to the modification of many others, so that of the amount the bill was increased in the Senate, the conferees propose to recede from something over one million dollars and to leave in the bill an increase of something less than eight hundred thousand dollars.

The Senate receded from amendments numbered 21, 22, 23, 24, 52, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 68, 69, 73, 75, 85, 94, 99, 100, leaving the bill, in so far as these amendments are concerned, in the form in which it passed the House.

The House receded from Senate amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 18, 19, 20, 25, 26, 29, 30, 32, 34, 36, 37, 40, 41, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 67, 77, 78, 80, 82, 83, 86, 87, 89, 91, 93, 102, 104, and from all other amendments the House receded with amendments.

Amendments numbered 1, 7, and 8 make immediately available a part of the appropriation for allotments under the act of 1887 and for irrigation and survey and subdivision of Indian reservations.

Amendments Nos. 18, 19, and 20 make continuous certain administrative features of the bill, which, with the exception of No. 20, have been in the Indian appropriation bill for many years.

Amendment No. 2 authorizes the purchase of supplies and the letting of contracts for irrigation work, where the expenditure does not exceed $5,000, without advertisement. This provision in substance has been in the Indian appropriation bill for ten years or more, but without limitation as to amount. The provision has been of convenience and value, especially where work was to be done on reservations remote from trade centers.

Amendment No. 3 provides that where a new bond is required of an officer of the Bureau, the old bond may be canceled.

Amendment No. 4, as agreed to in conference, grants authority to the Secretary of the Interior to dispose of buildings and lands now owned by any of the Five Civilized Tribes and heretofore used for tribal and school purposes, and to deposit the proceeds to the credit of the several tribes in the Treasury. The amendment also provides that pending a sale of such property the same may be leased for the benefit of the tribe affected.

The appropriation for "ditches and reservoirs," as presented to the House, contained the words "and so forth," and these words having been stricken out in the House, amendment No. 5 inserts the words "irrigating tools and appliances," which was intended to be covered by the objectionable words stricken out.

Amendments Nos. 6 and 9 are corrections in phraseology.

Amendment No. 10 increases by $15,000 the amount appropriated for suppression of the liquor traffic.

Amendment No. 11 increases by $100,000 the amount appropriated for the support of day and industrial schools.

Amendment No. 12 is the correction of total made necessary by the adoption of the previous amendments.

Amendment No. 13 authorizes the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to conduct experiments in reference to soil, climate, cultivation of grain and vegetables, etc., on school and agency farms.

Amendments Nos. 14 and 15 strike out words which were believed to be superfluous, and do not change the intent of the provisions.

Amendment No. 16 authorizes officers who have the disbursement of funds for Indians to deposit them in any convenient national bank, providing the officers making such deposits require from the bank so used a sufficient indemnity bond.

Amendment No. 17 authorizes the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to negotiate agreements with any Indian tribe having a present agreement with the United States for perpetual annuities for the surrender of these perpetual annuities, such agreements to be effective only when approved by Congress.

Amendments Nos. 25 and 26 make provision for the appointment of practical farmers and practical stockmen, subject only to such examination as the Secretary of the Interior prescribes.

Amendment No. 27 increases by $10,000 the appropriation for contingent expenses.

Amendment No. 28 provides for the Government paying the premium for bonds which it requires of disbursing officers.

Amendment No. 29 appropriates $9,000 and makes it immediately available for the improvement of the power and heating plant at the Phoenix, Ariz., school.

Amendment No. 30 is a change of total, made necessary by the adoption of amendment No. 29.

Amendment No. 31 appropriates $50,000 for purchasing homes for the Indians of northern California; provided that it is expressly understood that this shall be the final appropriation for this purpose.

Amendment No. 32 reappropriates $1,000 unexpended balance, heretofore appropriated for the purpose of removing obstructions in the bed of a stream flowing through the Round Valley Reservation, in California.

Amendment No. 33 appropriates $10,000 for the construction of a wagon road for the use of the Indians of the Hoopa Valley Indian Reservation, in California. The amendment as modified in conference provides that no part of this sum shall be expended until the proper officers of the Bureau shall certify that the amount herein appropriated will fully complete the work under contemplation.

Amendment No. 34 appropriates $15,000, to be expended by the Secretary of the Interior for the use of the Yuma and Colorado River Indians, and provides that the amount thus expended shall be reimbursed to the Treasury from the sale of lands provided for in the amendment.

Amendment No. 35 provided for the setting apart of a certain portion of the Coeur d'Alene Reservation, in Idaho, for a public park, transferring the same to the State of Idaho, and made appropriation for the payment to the Indians in compensation therefor. The amendment as agreed to in conference authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to sell the land therein described to the State of Idaho for park purposes. Upon receiving therefor such compensation as the Secretary of the Interior considers adequate, the amount so received to be held for the use and benefit of the Indians whose land is taken.

Amendment No. 36 authorizes the issuance of a patent to the Episcopal Church for certain lands now occupied by said church for church purposes on the Coeur d'Alene Reservation in Idaho, the patent to be issued only upon the consent of the Indians.

Amendment No. 37 makes available for the next fiscal year the unexpended balance of an appropriation heretofore made for the survey of the Lemhi Reservation in Idaho.

Amendment No. 38, as it passed the Senate, directed the Secretary of the Interior to expend $62,000 out of the funds of the Sac and Fox Indians, held in trust, in the manner described in the amendment for the benefit of said Indians. As agreed to in conference this amendment authorizes such expenditure in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

Amendment No. 39 is really a part of amendment No. 38, but it authorizes the further expenditure of $5,000 for the benefit of the same Indians in the manner described in the amendment.

Amendment No. 40 appropriates $600 for the purpose of putting in respectable condition an old Indian cemetery in Kansas.

Amendment No. 41 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to lay out highways on a section of land in the Pottawatomie Reservation in Kansas. It does not involve any expense on the part of the Government.

Amendment No. 42, as passed by the Senate, directed the Secretary of the Interior to pay to the Iowa Indians in Kansas the balance of their trust fund in the Treasury. The amendment, as agreed to in conference, authorizes the Secretary, in his discretion, to make such payment.

Amendment No. 43 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to make a roll of the Ottawa and Chippewa Indians who are entitled to participate in the funds to which the Court of Claims has held that they are entitled. In the conference a provision was added to this amendment charging the fund with the expense of making the roll.

Amendment No. 44 makes appropriation for the pay of the Indian agent at the White Earth Agency, Minn.

Amendment No. 45 is a change of total made necessary by amendment 44.

Amendment No. 46 is a reenactment of a provision in the last appropriation bill providing for a payment out of the funds of the Chippewas of Minnesota. By error in the last bill these Indians were described as "the Chippewas of Mississippi." This amendment is simply to correct that error.

Amendment No. 47 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to pay the expenses, out of the funds of the White Earth band, for an annual celebration which this band is accustomed to hold and which celebration is rather in the nature of a fair than anything else.

Amendment No. 48 modifies a statute providing for the payment of annual installments to the Red Lake Indians in the spring instead of in the fall.

Amendment No. 49 increases by $300 the compensation to be paid the Indian agent at Fort Berthold Agency, Mont. The House receded instead of the Senate.

Amendment No. 50 appropriates $10,000 for the construction of a saw and flour mill for the Flathead Indians to take the place of one destroyed by fire, the amendment providing that the amount thus expended should be reimbursed to the Treasury from the sale of lands of these Indians to be made after allotments are completed.

Amendment No. 51 makes an appropriation of $25,000, to be expended in the purchase of machines, tools, animals, etc., for the Fort Belknap Indians in Montana, and provides that said money shall be reimbursed to the Treasury from the proceeds of the sale of lands now being made.

Amendment No. 53 as passed by the Senate made an appropriation of $30,000, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior to locate the Rocky Boy's band on some reservation where the Indians on the reservation would agree to the same. As agreed to in conference, provision is made for locating these Indians upon public lands if there be suitable public lands available in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior.

Amendment No. 59 makes provision for charging Indian lands directly benefited by irrigation work done by the Reclamation Service with their proportion of the cost of such work, but especially provides that no lien shall be created against the lands which would by any possibility deprive the Indians of the title thereto. The amendment also authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to pay from the general irrigation fund appropriated in this bill the maintenance charge within the prescribed limit for a given period for this service.

Amendment No. 67 is simply a transposition.

Amendment No. 70 appropriates $5,000 for the purchase of live stock, seeds, farm implements, and machinery for the Wahpeton Indian School, North Dakota, and amendment No. 71 appropriates $2,500 for the making of walks and driveways and grading at the same school.

Amendment No. 72 makes an appropriation of $6,000 for the erection of a school hospital at the Wahpeton School, North Dakota, and amendment No. 74 appropriates $3,000 for the equipment of a laundry, workshop, and school buildings at said school.

Amendment No. 76 is a change of total made necessary by the adoption of prior amendments.

Amendment No. 77 appropriates $1,800 for the agent of the Fort Berthold Agency, this work having heretofore been done by the superintendent of the school, which has now been destroyed by fire.

Amendment No. 78 authorizes the sale of 640 acres of land set aside for reservation purposes at the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Agency in Oklahoma, and further authorizes the use of the money derived from such sale in improving and extending the school facilities provided for the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians.

Amendment No. 79 authorizes two Choctaw allottees to sell an acre of their allotments upon which alienation is restricted, the purpose of such sale being to provide a site for a church.

Amendments Nos. 80 and 83 are simply transpositions of totals.

Amendment No. 81, as passed by the Senate, directed the Secretary to disburse $100,000 of the trust funds of the Sac and Fox Indians of Mississippi for their benefit. As agreed to in conference, this payment is authorized in the discretion of the Secretary, in whose discretion, also, is left the payment of a note of $6,000, which is apparently a just charge upon the funds.

Amendment No. 82 provides for the payment of $215,000 as a full and complete settlement of all differences growing out of all treaties between the United States and the Mexican Kickapoo Indians, and provides that the receipt of said money shall be a discharge in full of all claim and demand of said Indians against the United States.

Amendments Nos. 84 and 86 are purely phraseological.

Amendment No. 87 extends the power of the Secretary of the Interior in investigating as to the allotted lands of the Five Civilized Tribes; not merely the leasing thereof, but powers of attorney, contracts, deeds, or agreements given in reference to the sale thereof.

Amendment No. 88 makes provision for the collection of attorneys' fees where contracts therefor have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior in actions brought to recover lands of the Five Civilized Tribes, and it makes these fees a lien upon the lands about which the action was carried on.

Amendment No. 89 authorizes the payment to one Samuel Brown of $7,384.94 from the funds of the Creek Nation, the Department having made investigation as to the justice of this claim and reported in favor thereof.

Amendment No. 90, as agreed to in conference, provides for the payment to Governor Johnson, governor of the Chickasaws, of $1,500 per year from March 4, 1906, until the day he ceases to act as such governor. Governor Johnson has not drawn compensation as governor, the salary heretofore fixed having been $1,500, the Chickasaw council having passed an act increasing this compensation to $3,000, and the President not having approved the same.

Amendment No. 91 increases from $150,000 to $300,000 the appropriation for schools for children other than Indian children living in what has heretofore been the Indian Territory.

Amendment No. 92 directs the Secretary of the Interior to bring to completion by July 1, 1909, the work now being done by the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes.

Amendment No. 93 appropriates $108,000 to pay the claim of the Klamath Indians for lands formerly within their reservation, but erroneously allotted by the United States to settlers.

Amendment No. 95 increases by $100 the compensation of the agent at the Lower Brule Agency.

Amendment No. 96 increases by $400 the compensation of the agent at the Pine Ridge Agency.

Amendment No. 97 is a change of the total made necessary by amendments Nos. 95 and 96.

Amendment No. 98, as passed by the Senate, appropriated $5,000 for the development of certain springs on the farm of the Rapid City School, South Dakota. The amendment, as agreed to in conference, authorizes the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to invite proposals for the construction and completion of a water system for the schools, to be supplied from said springs.

Amendment No. 101 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to expend of the trust funds of the Ute Indians an amount not to exceed $75,000 to relieve their present distressed condition.

Amendment No. 102 appropriates $300,000 for payment to the Colville Indians, as provided by the agreement with them ratified in 1906.

Amendment No. 103 permits the leasing of lands of the Unitah and Uncompahgre Indians in Utah, which are susceptible of irrigation, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior. In receding from this amendment the House made provision for the transfer of the amendment from its erroneous place in the bill under the State of Wyoming to the proper point in the bill under the State of Utah.

Amendment No. 104 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior, with the consent of the Indians of the Wind River Reservation in Wyoming, to transfer to the Catholic Church the lands now occupied by the said church for church and school purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 19355) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PERKINS, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. CLAY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 17288) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. TALIAFERRO as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4788. An act to provide for increasing the limit of cost of the public building authorized to be erected at Americus, Sumter County, Ga.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 17983. An act for completing the pediment of the House wing of the Capitol.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 4788. An act to provide for increasing the limit of cost of the public building authorized to be erected at Americus, Sumter County, Ga.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

SAFE TRANSPORTATON OF EXPLOSIVES.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 17228) with the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17228) to promote the safe transportation in interstate commerce of explosives and other dangerous articles, and to provide penalties for its violation.

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful to transport, carry, or convey any dynamite, gunpowder, or other explosive between a place in any foreign country and a place within the United States, or a place in any State, Territory, or District of the United States, and a place in any other State, Territory, or District thereof, on any vessel or vehicle of any description operated by a common carrier, which vessel or vehicle is carrying passengers for hire: Provided, That it shall be lawful to transport on any such vessel, or vehicle, small arms ammunition in any quantity, and such fuses, torpedoes, rockets, or other signal devices as may be essential to promote safety in operation, and properly packed and marked samples of explosives for laboratory examination, not exceeding a net weight of one-half pound each, and not exceeding twenty samples at one time in a single vessel or vehicle; but such samples shall not be carried in that part of a vessel or vehicle which is intended for the transportation of passengers for hire: And provided further, That nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the transportation of military or naval forces with their accompanying munitions of war on passenger equipment vessels or vehicles.

SEC. 2. That within ninety days of the passage of this act the Interstate Commerce Commission shall formulate regulations for the safe transportation of explosives, and said regulations shall be binding upon all common carriers engaged in interstate commerce which transport explosives by land, and violations of them shall be subject to the penalties hereinafter provided. The Interstate Commerce Commission, on its own motion or upon application made by any interested party, may make changes or modifications of the regulations for the safe transportation of explosives, made desirable by new information or altered conditions, and such changed regulations shall have all the force of the original regulations. The regulations for the safe transportation of explosives referred to in this section shall be in accord with the best known practicable means for securing safety in transit, covering the packing, marking, loading, handling while in transit, and the precautions necessary to determine whether the material when offered is in proper condition to transport. The regulations for the safe transportation of explosives shall take effect three months after their formulation and publication by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and shall be in effect until reversed, set aside, or modified.

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful to transport, carry, or convey liquid nitroglycerin, fulminate in bulk in dry condition, or other like explosive between a place in a foreign country and a place within the United States, or a place in one State, Territory, or District of the United States and a place in any other State, Territory, or District thereof, on any vessel or vehicle of any description operated by a common carrier in the transportation of passengers or articles of commerce by land or water.

SEC. 4. Every package containing explosives or other dangerous articles when presented to a common carrier for shipment shall have plainly marked on the outside thereof the contents thereof, and it shall be unlawful for any person to deliver, for interstate or foreign transportation, to any common carrier engaged in interstate or foreign commerce by land or water, or to cause to be delivered, or to carry, any explosive, or other dangerous article, under any false or deceptive marking, description, invoice, shipping order, or other declaration, or without informing the agent of such carrier of the true character thereof, at or before the time such delivery or carriage is made.

SEC. 5. That every person who knowingly violates, or causes to be violated, any of the foregoing provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished for each offense by a fine not exceeding $2,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding eighteen months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 6. That this act shall take effect immediately, and all acts or parts of acts in conflict therewith are hereby repealed, except section 4422 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which shall remain in full force and effect.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I demand a second, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall be compelled to object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] will take their places as tellers.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 104, noes 66.

The SPEAKER. The yeas have it, and a second is ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to note that there is no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Well, there has been a roll call within ten minutes which showed 251. The Chair had gentlemen in his eye who did not vote, and the point is not well taken.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We have just this moment taken a vote by tellers.

The SPEAKER. Oh, certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And every man present on the floor, so far as I know, passed through the tellers.

The SPEAKER. There were those present who did not pass between the tellers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Except those who were paired.

The SPEAKER. There were Members present who did not pass through the tellers; and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do I understand the Speaker to overrule the point of no quorum?

The SPEAKER. The Chair takes the evidence of the roll call which has taken place within the last ten minutes as against the record that was made by gentlemen passing through the tellers, the Chair having knowledge that in some instances Members present did not pass through the tellers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Members present who were paired did not pass through the tellers.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Chair holds——

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that a quorum is present.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Chair holds that the record discloses a quorum and the Chair will rule that the point is dilatory, I understand?

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that a quorum is present. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is, as stated in its title, to promote the safe transportation in interstate commerce of explosives and other dangerous articles, and to provide penalties for its violation. The existing laws governing this matter are very antiquated and inadequate, and the great traveling public is in considerable peril from a lack of suitable regulations to provide for the proper transportation of explosives. There will always be danger incident to their transportation; but it was the thought of the committee—and, as I understand, the bill is unanimously reported by the committee—that this measure covers the ground about as well as can be done at this time, and without imposing any undue hardship upon these carriers or anybody else. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman takes his seat, I desire to ask him here if he can state to the House the existing law in regard to the transportation of nitroglycerin and other explosives?

Mr. WANGER. I can not, further than that this section of the Revised Statutes, which is excepted out of the repealing clause that reads, "from transportation on vessels unless they have suitable chests in which to carry them."

Mr. SHERLEY. Is the gentleman aware that section 5353 of the Revised Statutes now forbids the shipments of nitroglycerin, and so forth, and does the gentleman intend by this act to repeal that section, or has his committee considered that section at all?

Mr. WANGER. I assume that the committee considered that section, although personally I am unable to state.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not undertaking to ask the gentleman questions for any purpose of annoyance, but we had this subject up before the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and considered it in some detail, and there is now existing a law covering this matter. Whether it is complete or not is for the House to determine, but I think the House should consider the existing law, together with the proposed law, in determining the question.

Mr. WANGER. The legislation is very incomplete, according to the judgment of the experts who appeared before the committee.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, in the main I believe that the legislation aimed at in this bill is very commendable, but I desire to call the attention of the House to a part of section 2 and to the penalty provided in section 5. Section 2 of the act provides:

> That within ninety days from the passage of this act the Interstate Commerce Commission shall formulate regulations for the safe transportation of explosives, and said regulations shall be binding upon all common carriers engaged in interstate commerce which transport explosives by land, and violations of them shall be subject to the penalties hereinafter provided.

Section 5 provides:

> That every person who knowingly violates, or causes to be violated, any of the foregoing provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished for each offense by a fine not exceeding $2,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding eighteen months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

The part I desire to object to is the making of departmental law. For one I object to giving the Departments of the Government the power to make statutes and then imposing a penalty upon persons or individuals for a violation of the rules or regulations made by the Department. I believe that Congress ought to legislate along this line, but I do sincerely object and protest against centering power in the hands of a Department and giving that Department complete authority to make rules and regulations and then follow those rules and regulations up by an act of Congress making it a violation, not of the act of Congress, but of a rule or regulation passed by a Department of the Government, and thereby subjecting an individual to the penalty of a fine or a fine and imprisonment also.

As I said a while ago, I believe it is a subject upon which Congress should legislate, and I believe it should give it careful and scrutinizing attention. A couple of years ago, in my own State, in the city of Terre Haute, a car of dynamite exploded and killed and crippled a great many people.

Therefore I commend the object and purpose of Congress in attempting to legislate upon this subject, but I do not agree with the provisions of this bill, delegating the power of Congress to some Department of the Government, and then saying that a violation, not of the statute alone, but of a rule or regulation of a Department, shall be punished as a penal offense. I believe it to be the duty of Congress to prescribe the rules and regulations itself, thereby making it a plain, positive statute. The presumption of law is that everyone is presumed to know the law, but I do not believe that the presumption obtains to the extent that everyone is presumed to know the rules and regulations of a Department. The idea of convicting any one and imposing a heavy fine or a sentence in a prison for violating a rule or regulation of a Department is, in my judgment, not only wrong, but is a dangerous precedent. I earnestly object to this part of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. I am much obliged to the gentleman, but I do not wish to occupy time at this moment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to yield, then, five minutes, to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have read in my time an amendment which I propose to offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, after the word "court," in line 19, page 5, the following:

"SEC. 6. That every common carrier engaged in interstate commerce shall keep a record of all vinous, spirituous, malt, and intoxicating beverages transported by it from one State into another, which record shall show the names of the consignor and consignee, the kind and quantity of liquor contained in each package, the name of the party to whom delivered, and the date of delivery, and such record shall be open to inspection by the peace officers of the county in which the office of delivery is situated.

"SEC. 7. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier engaged in interstate commerce to transport or accept for transportation from one State into another any package containing vinous, spirituous, malt, or intoxicating beverages unless there shall be plainly marked thereon in large, clear letters the name of the consignee and the kind and quantity of liquor contained therein.

"SEC. 8. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier engaged in interstate commerce to deliver to any person in one State any vinous, spirituous, malt, or intoxicating beverage transported by it from another State unless the package containing it shall be marked or labeled as required by section 2 of this act, and no such package shall be delivered to any person except the consignee whose name appears thereon as such or upon his written order.

"SEC. 9. That whoever, for the purpose of having delivery made to him or his agent, shall falsely pretend to any agent or employee of any common carrier that he is the consignee of any vinous, spirituous, malt, or intoxicating beverage transported from another State, or shall, under any assumed or fictitious name, or any name not his own, make or utter any order for such beverage, or receipt for or accept delivery thereof, shall upon conviction be punished by imprisonment for not more than six months.

"SEC. 10. That whoever shall deliver to any common carrier for transportation into another State any package containing any vinous, spirituous, malt, or intoxicating beverage without having plainly marked thereon the name of the consignee and the kind and quantity of beverage it contains shall upon conviction be imprisoned for not more than six months."

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. If I am permitted to offer that as an amendment under the rules of the House, I shall do so when this bill is taken up for consideration. It is an amendment which every man in the House who is in favor of the due process of law and really wants the laws properly enforced will be in favor of. I introduced a bill some time ago which is in the exact language of this amendment. It relates purely and simply and solely to interstate commerce, but for some reason unknown to me—perhaps because I am not skilled in parliamentary procedure, at any rate, for some reason—this bill, as were all similar bills, was referred, not to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which under the rules has exclusive jurisdiction over such matters, but to the Committee on the Judiciary, where they doubtless sleep the sleep that knows no waking. [Laughter.]

Being of the minority, I am helpless, and therefore must get the subject-matter before the House as best I can. The only way I can get it before the House is to offer it as an amendment, and when this bill is taken up for consideration I shall do so in order to give the Members of this House an opportunity to express themselves on a proposition which must commend itself to their judgment. [Applause.]

I understand that under the rules of this House, which we on this side of the Chamber, however, had no hand in making, this amendment can be ruled out of order. Just why, I confess I do not understand; but, like the peace of the Lord, the rules of this House passeth all understanding. Under them a bill proposing to regulate interstate shipments of intoxicating liquors is not referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce—which is generally believed here, I may add, to look with favor upon such legislation—but to the Committee on the Judiciary, which does not rest under any such suspicion. The bill which we are now considering and which I desire to amend proposes to regulate interstate shipments of dynamite and other explosives, and I submit that under all the rules of reason and orderly procedure—I am, of course, not referring to the rules of this House, which have nothing to do with either reason or orderly procedure—it is germane to so broaden its scope by amendment as to include in its regulation interstate shipments of intoxicating liquors. Be that, however, as it may, Mr. Speaker, I can do my duty in the matter and present the amendment, believing as I do, that its enactment into law would deal a veritable deathblow to the illicit liquor traffic, and then let it meet such fate as may be meted out to it in this House, whose rules and procedure are determined absolutely and changed daily by the "party of great moral ideas." [Applause.]

I now yield back the balance of my time to my colleague, the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi, as I understand, had that read simply for information?

The SPEAKER. That is all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEAKE] in order that he may ask a question of the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. LEAKE. Mr. Speaker, I secured the time for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the purpose of this bill was not to allow the transportation of gunpowder, dynamite, and nitroglycerin with less restrictions upon the railroad companies than the laws of many States in this country now permit. I recollect that in the State of New Jersey the regulations about the transportation of nitroglycerin are much more rigorous than the provisions of this bill. If this bill be passed, it will override the reserved rights of the States to protect the public health and safety which are recognized in many cases and which in the matter of the shipment of dynamite in interstate commerce, while primarily for Congressional legislation, has been transferred to the States by Congress by construction in the case of Jervey (66 Fed. Rep., 960). The purpose of this legislation is to change the existing law and allow the shipment of dynamite with much less regulation than now generally required by the States in protecting the health of their citizens.

Mr. WANGER. I will say to the gentleman that I know of no such purpose, and I do not think it could be accomplished, because the gentleman will remember that the State laws only refer to State commerce.

Mr. LEAKE. I understand that thoroughly, but I wanted to know whether this was not the purpose of the bill.

Mr. WANGER. No; the main purpose is to secure the proper marking and billing of these articles. As the case is now, articles are falsely billed. The railroad company receives them, supposing them to be entirely harmless, and there appears to be no penalty against it. A large quantity of explosives are carried by gentlemen with dress suit cases in passenger cars.

Mr. LEAKE. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to vote against the bill, because I am opposed to a provision of law under the interstate-commerce clause allowing the transporattion of these dangerous articles, dangerous to life and limb of the people of my State, changing the existing law, which Congress in its wisdom thought might be more properly exercised by the States. The sovereign States have never surrendered their police power to protect the health and life of its citizens, and many cases hold that the State under its police regulations may incidentally affect interstate commerce by regulations. The States know best how to protect their citizens in this matter, and I prefer to leave the statute which permits them to exercise that right in the shipment of dynamite and explosives unrepealed and unchanged by this new measure before the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know that I desire all that time, but I want to call to the attention of the gentleman who has the bill in charge the fact that in one particular the bill is defective. The bill, of course, is based on the commerce clause of the Constitution, but it does not cover all cases of interstate and foreign commerce which are possible. It does not provide for shipments made from any of the foreign possessions of the United States to America. For instance, a shipment from any State in the Union to Porto Rico, a shipment to the Philippines, or from the Philippines to Porto Rico, or Porto Rico to Alaska—none of these are covered by the words of this act.

Mr. WANGER. Is it not covered by the section of the Revised Statutes?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will notice in the first paragraph, the language provides that—

> It shall be unlawful to transport, carry, or convey any dynamite, gunpowder, or other explosive between a place in any foreign country and a place within the United States, or a place in any State, Territory, or District of the United States and a place in any other State, Territory, or District thereof.

Now, the Philippine Islands are neither a State, Territory, or District, and the language used here is not sufficient to designate them, or to designate Porto Rico, and it would not cover those cases. This matter is one of considerable difficulty to cover by the use of proper language, and the Committee on Revision of the Laws in considering the subject undertook to cover it by use of this language:

> Or places noncontiguous to, but subject to the jurisdiction thereof.

That is, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. We believe that the insertion of that language would cover those cases growing out of commerce between the foreign possessions of the United States and the United States proper. I mention this, not for the purpose of opposing the bill, but for the purpose of calling attention to it, so that when the bill is considered in the other branch of Congress if the point I now make is well taken, it can be there corrected. I regret that it is necessary to consider this bill with this limited opportunity for debate, and without opportunity for amendment. The existing law is perhaps not complete, and how far it may or may not be repealed by this proposed law I am unable on a hasty examination to determine, but I have satisfied myself that in the particulars pointed out the bill is defective. It will not cover those cases, and they ought certainly to be brought within the purview of this law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I came into the House this morning with the idea in my mind from what I had heard about the contents of this bill, not having read it, that I would support it. After having heard it read, it strikes me that it is entirely too weighty in its possible consequences to be passed by the House with as little explanation, consideration, and opportunity for a full understanding as the House has had or can have under a motion to suspend the rules, with only twenty minutes on a side.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago I made the point that a quorum was not present. The Constitution of the United States guarantees to the minority the right to have a quorum to do business. That has been construed to mean a quorum, whether by vote or by count. The Speaker a moment ago ruled it to mean that where an absence of a quorum was affirmatively disclosed by count through the tellers he could yet rule that there was a quorum present without counting the Members to confirm his judgment and contradict the tellers under Rule XV.

Mr. SHERMAN. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And without counting to add to those who had voted others who were present, if any there were, sitting in their seats and not passing through the tellers.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, under the rule I rise to a point of order, that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is entitled to speak upon the bill before the House, and upon that bill only.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The remarks of the "gentleman from Mississippi" are addressed to this or any other bill before the House. In discussing any bill that may be before the House the "gentleman from Mississippi," I take it, has a right to say that the House itself, in the sense of the Constitution, is not, or when the point was made was not, present, and the House, not being present, that legislation can not be carried on. The minority having been overridden by a ruling declaring the House present, or, in other words, a quorum to do business, when it was not, Mr. Speaker, that is a reason why this particular legislation or any other being transacted, even if right in itself, should be voted against by the minority upon this floor—not that an adverse vote will defeat the legislation, but that it will make it to come up at some other time in the regular way and meet with full consideration when the proper rights shall be accorded to the minority in its consideration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. Did the Chair understand the gentleman from Mississippi to make the point that no quorum is present?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The "gentleman from Mississippi" made the point of no quorum immediately after the record of a vote by tellers disclosed the fact that no quorum was present. Now, the gentleman makes this point——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the point that no quorum is present?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not care to make that point now. I am talking about the time when it was made, and the "gentleman from Mississippi" calls the attention of the Speaker to the fact that although the Speaker said——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The others were present——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He did not note their names, as Rule XIV requires——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend. Does the gentleman from Mississippi make the point that no quorum is present?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The "gentleman from Mississippi" does not now make the point of no quorum, because he believes a quorum is now present. It has come in since.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] is recognized.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE.]

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Mississippi who has just addressed the House claimed he was speaking in order because he said he had made a point of order a few moments ago that no quorum was present——

Mr. SHERLEY. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from New York is not speaking to the bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman from Mississippi spoke to the bill or——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman from Mississippi was not allowed to speak——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Mississippi kept talking when his time was exhausted and he is still talking.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will suspend. The Chair sustains the point of order [applause on the Democratic side] and trusts that the gentleman from New York, the Chair having sustained the point or order, will set a good example to the House by proceeding in order. [Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary for the Speaker of the House to make any such suggestion to the gentleman from New York, the Speaker having ruled that the gentleman from New York was not in order in the line in which he answered the gentleman from Mississippi. This is a very important bill, Mr. Speaker. It is a bill looking to the protection of human life. It is a bill that would insure the safety of the public when coming in contact or in proximity to any interstate vehicle in the United States conveying any dangerous explosives such as powder, dynamite, or other dangerous explosive. The gentleman from Kentucky criticises it in that it does not apply to all the territory belonging to the United States. The gentleman from Kentucky is always solicitous about the Philippine Islands; he has been so ever since he and I had an opportunity of visiting those islands and studying the conditions there. I think, perhaps, the criticism of the gentleman from Kentucky is just, so far as the bill is concerned, and the bill would be improved if it could be amended.

Of course it can not be under this proposition; but I understand there are still left laws that would perhaps protect the transportation of this dangerous material to the Philippine Islands. There are other statutes upon the statute books which are not repealed. But this does affect all these dangerous explosives brought from any portion of the country into any portion of continental United States, and also it protects all the transportation of these explosives by any vehicle whatever in interstate commerce between the States and Territories and the District of Columbia. My friend from New Jersey is unduly exercised because he fears that it does not cover the transportation of explosive material in the State of New Jersey. That would be intrastate commerce, not interstate commerce; and of course only the State of New Jersey could take care of that matter, and the gentleman should study the Constitution of the United States and observe the difference between the powers of the Federal Government and the powers of the several sovereign States——

The SPEAKER. In pursuance of the order of the House, the hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the Chair declares the House in recess until to-morrow at 11.30 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, submitting an estimate of appropriation for a roadway in Potomac Park (H. R. Doc. 856) was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 10, 1908.

[Continuation of the legislative day of Monday, April 6, 1908.]

The recess having expired, the House, at 11 o'clock and 30 minutes a. m., was called to order by the Speaker.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House the Chair declares the House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the naval appropriation bill under the terms of the rule adopted, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 20471, the naval appropriation bill. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20471) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes.

Mr. FOSS. I understood that under the rule which was adopted the first reading of the bill was dispensed with in regard to all appropriation bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the rule contains nothing on the subject.

Mr. FOSS. Well, Mr. Chairman, in the absence of any language on the subject, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, what is the request?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the naval appropriation bill be dispensed with.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Under the special rule that would cut off debate just to that extent, and I shall not object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, the naval appropriation bill carries an appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, of $103,967,518. The estimates which were submitted by the Department to this House and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs amounted to $125,041,349, but the committee, after hearings and careful consideration of the needs of the different bureaus of the naval service, reported this bill with a reduction from these estimates amounting to $22,518,831. I have submitted an extensive report upon the appropriations carried in this bill, and upon the projected naval programmes of foreign countries, but there is one mistake in the report which I desire to correct at this time, and that relates to the naval programme of England for the coming year.

I have received this letter from the Office of Naval Intelligence correcting the statement which appears upon page 24 in the report on the English programme for 1908. It is stated there that the naval programme for England is two battle ships, four medium-sized armored cruisers, one large seagoing destroyer, and some ocean-going destroyers, and so forth. In place of that I desire to insert that the naval estimates that have just been submitted to Parliament, in England, provide for one battle ship, one large armored cruiser, eight fast protected cruisers, and sixteen torpedo-boat destroyers, and a number of submarines, to cost $2,433,250.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one word in regard to the personnel of the Navy. As Farragut once said, "It takes two things to make up a navy—first, men, and then ships, but the most important is men." I will say that to-day we have a shortage of officers. In order to officer all the ships which are now being built for the Navy it will be necessary to have a considerable increase in the number of officers, but in view of the fact that we have increased the number of midshipmen at the Naval Academy, and these large classes will be graduating from now on, we will be able to make up this shortage which now exists.

Now, in regard to the men in the Navy. Under our present law we have 36,000 men in the Navy. Never before perhaps in the history of the new Navy have we had our quota filled until this year. The recruiting has been exceptionally good, and when the Secretary of the Navy appeared before the committee he stated in his hearing that the Navy was within 600 of the full quota of men authorized by law. During the last year there were a great many applicants for admission into the Navy; more than 45,000 men applied for admission; and to show you with what care men are selected, I will state what appears in the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, that of these applicants only about 14,000 were actually taken into the Navy. Not only that, but the character of the men who are coming into the Navy to-day is better than ever before. They are coming from the Western farms and prairies; and while they come into the Navy without any knowledge of naval affairs, yet, under the course of training which is pursued at our different naval training stations, in a short time they become expert seamen. And there has never been a time in the history of the American Navy when the personnel stood so high in character, intelligence, and in patriotism as it does at this hour. [Applause.]

Another thing that I will say for the American Navy is that our desertions during the past year has been falling off—a less percentage than we had last year. Then also the citizenship of the Navy is improving. A number of years ago there were a great many foreigners in our Navy, but to-day, as the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation reports in his report as it appears on page 20, the Bureau during the year has gone even further to reduce the number of aliens in the Navy by providing that no one can enter the Navy on the first enlistment who is not a full citizen of the United States. To-day we have a number of foreigners, but a very small percentage, and that percentage is growing less and less as the years run on. For instance, among the petty officers the percentage of American citizens is 96.5; among the enlisted men it is 93.2, and among the citizens, taking in the whole enlisted force of the Navy—citizens of the United States—it is 94.2 per cent, showing an increase in what might be called the "work of Americanizing the American Navy."

Now, another thing I desire to state, also in reference to the personnel of the Navy, and that is that our target practice to-day is better than it has ever been since we started in to build up the new Navy. There are more hits, there is better marksmanship, and higher records have been made, records which I think will not only compare favorably with the records made in foreign navies, but, I think, if I were to divulge the confidential character of the reports, they would even be better than that of any navy in the world.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the first paragraph of this bill relates to the pay of men in the Navy. It makes an appropriation of $27,000,000 for that purpose. And I desire to say a word about the pay of officers and men in the Navy. Until the personnel bill was passed, on March 3, 1899, the pay of officers in the Navy was less than the pay of officers in the Army.

But that bill provided that the pay of officers from then on on the active list of the Navy should be much the same as that of officers of corresponding rank in the Army. In that personnel act, however, a provision was made that the Army pay should be cut 15 per cent to officers when on shore duty. That, however, was rectified by the act of Congress of June 29, 1906, when this 15 per cent which had been lopped off the pay of officers serving on shore was restored, and the officers of the Army and Navy were paid the same on shore as on sea. Now, so much for the pay of officers in the Navy.

In regard to the pay of the men, I would state that the pay of the enlisted force in the Navy, with the exception of two or three corps—that of the paymasters' clerks and the mates and warrant officers—is fixed by the President of the United States. A law was passed as far back as 1814, which is known as section 1569 of the Revised Statutes, and provides as follows:

> The pay to be allowed to petty officers, excepting mates, and the pay and bounty upon enlistment of seamen, ordinary seamen, firemen, and coal heavers in the naval service shall be fixed by the President: Provided, That the whole sum to be given for the whole pay aforesaid and for the pay of officers and for the said bounties upon enlistment shall not exceed for any one year the amount which may in such year be appropriated for such purposes.

The pay for the men in the Navy, including the petty officers, with the exception of the few classes which I have enumerated, is fixed, then, by the President of the United States, subject to the limitation of the appropriations by Congress.

Now, in all the years since authority has been given to the President of the United States to fix the pay of the men in the Navy, I may say that no Executive has ever abused that authority or discretion. While the Army appropriation bill was under consideration, it was stated, I think, by some gentleman upon the floor that the pay of the men in the Navy had been recently increased. I want to state that I do not find that to be the fact. There has been no general increase in the pay of the men in the Navy since 1884. That was under the Administration of President Arthur. When a man enters or enlists in the Navy, he goes in first as a landsman, at $16 a month. Then later he becomes an ordinary seaman, at $19 a month, whereas in the Army he enlists at the present time at $13 a month. But I think it is hardly a fair proposition to make a comparison between the Army and the Navy. The Army is upon the land; the Navy is upon the sea. The life of a sailor is more laborious than that of a soldier. He is away from home; he has to suffer more discomfort than the soldier. But if we wish to make a comparison of the pay between the Army and the Navy, we can compare, perhaps, more profitably the pay in the Navy with the pay to the seamen in some of our little navies, the infant navies of the Republic, which are connected with some of the different Departments. For instance, we have in connection with the War Department a navy called the "transport service." Now, it may seem strange, perhaps, to you, if you have not looked up the question; but we have a navy in connection with the transport service of the War Department which is greater in tonnage than we had in commission at the opening of the civil war. I refer simply to the vessels that were in commission at the time of the outbreak of the civil war. When the civil war broke out, we had forty-two vessels in commission, and they had a total tonnage of 45,847 tons. In the Army transport service to-day we have a tonnage of 68,404 tons—a larger navy in the Army transport service than we had in commission at the outbreak of the civil war, and some of the vessels in the Army transport service have a larger tonnage than the vessels that were in the civil war. Now, compare the pay of the men in the Navy with the pay of the seamen in the Army transport service—that would be a fair comparison—and if we do that we would find that the seamen in the Army transport service are paid much more than the men in the Navy. Not only that, but if we wanted to make a still further comparison in regard to some of these little navies of the Republic, we could take the Light-House Service, and the Light-House Service to-day has in it forty-six vessels and a tonnage of over 18,000 tons of ships—and I am speaking simply of the tender service of the Light-House Service, not the stationary ships.

Then we might go still further and inquire as to the Revenue-Cutter Service. We have forty-one vessels in that navy, which has a tonnage of over 19,000 tons and 1,288 seamen. Also we have a little navy in connection with the United States Coast Survey. Also we have other navies connected with the Public Health and the Marine-Hospital Service, with the Engineer Department of the Army, with the Coast and Geodetic Survey, with the Bureau of Fisheries, and also the Bureaus of Navigation and Naturalization. We have outside of the Regular Navy of the country all these little infant navies, and if we were to make a comparison between the pay of the men in the Regular Navy and the pay of the men in these little navies, you would find that the pay of the men in the Regular Navy is very much less indeed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to pass on, having spoken upon the subject of the pay of the Navy, but before doing so I desire to give notice here that when this paragraph is reached in the bill I shall offer an amendment to make the pay of the officers the same as that of the officers of corresponding grade in the Army.

When the Army appropriation bill was before the House, you will recall that an amendment was put on it increasing the pay of the enlisted force in the Army. When it went to the Senate it was reported, and has already passed the Senate with an amendment increasing the pay of the officers in the Army 25 per cent in the lower grades and down to 5 per cent in the higher grades. In view of this fact, that it is quite likely that some provision of law will be passed at this session in the Army bill increasing the pay of the officers of the Army, I desire to state that I shall offer at the appropriate time a provision increasing the pay of the officers in the Navy.

The provision I shall offer has already been reported to this House by unanimous report from the Naval Committee, and will be found in House bill 17527, which provides:

> A bill (17527) to equalize and fix the pay of the Navy and the Marine Corps, and for other purposes.
> Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the pay and allowances, except forage and mileage, which shall be governed by existing law, of all officers of the Navy and the Marine Corps shall be the same as the pay and allowances of officers of corresponding rank in the Army.
> SEC. 2. That the pay of midshipmen, warrant officers, mates, and paymasters' clerks is hereby increased 25 per cent: Provided, That the pay and allowances of midshipmen after graduation at the Naval Academy shall be the same as that provided for second lieutenants of the Army, not mounted.
>
> SEC. 3. That the pay of all commissioned, warrant, and appointed officers, and enlisted men of the Navy and the Marine Corps on the retired list shall hereafter be based on the pay, as herein provided for, of commissioned, warrant, and appointed officers, and enlisted men of corresponding rank and service on the active lists.
> SEC. 4. That nothing herein contained shall be construed so as to reduce the pay or allowances now authorized by law for any commissioned, warrant, or appointed officer or any enlisted man on either the active or retired list of the Navy or Marine Corps, and that all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Everyone recognizes that the two services should be treated alike. So I give notice of my intention in this respect to submit this bill as an amendment upon the naval appropriation bill at the end of the first paragraph in the bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak with reference to the material of the Navy, and I would like the attention of the committee at this time. In my report will be found a statement showing the number of ships already built for the Navy, and also a statement showing the number of ships now in process of construction for the Navy. When all of these vessels are built we will have twenty-nine battle ships, twelve armored cruisers, forty-four cruisers, twenty-one destroyers, thirty-two torpedo boats, and twenty submarines. Our Navy will rank third among the navies of the world.

The statement has appeared in the public press that we rank second. It happens at this time, taking into consideration only the ships already built, that we are ahead of France, but it is not an accurate statement of the situation. Taking into consideration the ships already built and those building we will rank third among the navies of the world.

Now, we have provided in this bill, under the head of "Increase of the Navy," an appropriation of $23,963,915 for ships already authorized and in process of construction. In order to complete these ships it will be necessary to authorize some more appropriations, not this year, but next. To complete these ships fully it will be necessary to appropriate next year the sum of $9,313,974. That will complete the ships which have already been authorized.

The committee this year have authorized some new construction. The Secretary of the Navy appeared before the committee and recommended a naval programme of four new battle ships, four scout cruisers, ten destroyers, four submarines, one ammunition ship, one repair ship, two mine-laying ships, four fleet colliers—a programme amounting to $69,000,000.

The General Board of the Navy Department recommended practically the same programme, but the Committee on Naval Affairs, after a careful consideration of the subject, recognizing that there are other Departments of the Government which necessarily must receive appropriations this year, and taking into consideration also the condition of our revenues and our expenditures, came to the conclusion that the recommendation of two battle ships, duplicates of ships which have already been authorized under the appropriation act of last year, would meet with the fair sense and judgment of this House.

And so in this bill we have recommended the building of these two battle ships of 20,000 tons each. They will cost in the neighborhood of $10,000,000 each. In addition to that we have recommended the construction of ten torpedo-boat destroyers, each to cost about $800,000, and eight submarines—a naval programme which will cost in the neighborhood of $30,000,000, a little less than one-half of that which is recommended by the Secretary of the Navy and the General Board.

Mr. Chairman, I desire now to speak a little upon the cost of our Navy. This is a great year in the history of the new Navy. It was twenty-five years ago that we started in to build up the new Navy under the Administration of President Arthur. March 3, 1883, was the birthday of the new Navy. That year, at that time, we authorized the Atlanta, the Boston, the Chicago, and the Dolphin, sometimes called the A, B, C, and D of the new Navy. Since that time we have been going on, year after year, building cruisers, battle ships, and destroyers, until to-day we have a good Navy. Now, it may interest some of the Members of this House to know how much this Navy has cost, how much we have expended in the construction of these ships. The cost of all these battle ships which we have authorized amounts to $309,000,000. We have appropriated for the Navy during the last twenty-five years $1,244,657,000. Of this, as I say, $309,000,000 have gone into the construction of the new ships, leaving a balance of $935,000,000, which have gone to the maintenance of the naval establishment during the last twenty-five years. This has been an average per year of $37,000,000 for maintenance. This is what the new Navy has cost us.

March 3, as I said, 1883, was the birthday of the new Navy. We started in then to build our first new ships, which were cruisers, but it was not until 1890 that we authorized the first battle ship, which was the Indiana. That battle ship had a tonnage of 10,288 tons. Its freeboard was about 11 feet and 6 inches. It has armor plate upon its sides 18 inches thick. Its speed was less than 16 knots. That was the first battle ship that Congress authorized, and it cost in the neighborhood of about $6,000,000.

To-day we are building greater battle ships—two of them, the Delaware and the North Dakota. They have each a tonnage of 20,000 tons. The armor plate upon their sides is only 9 inches thick, but better armor, and their freeboards are much higher—twice as high as those of the Indiana—all of which goes to show that during the last eighteen years there has been a mighty and tremendous development in the construction of the American battle ship. The guns upon the Indiana were built to fire only once every five minutes, but upon the new battle ships the large guns, the 12-inch guns, will each fire twice every minute if necessary. In fact, there is hardly anything which the hand of man has contrived during the last twenty-five years which has undergone such a tremendous revolution and change as the great battle ship, the instrument of warfare, the instrument of the nation's defense. If you look at the character of our battle ships first authorized by Congress and as we authorize them to-day, you will be struck by the fact that they illustrate the policy of Congress. The Indiana has a low freeboard of about 11 feet and 6 inches. What was the idea of the Navy back at the time when the Indiana was built? Then we were building up this Navy, but not with the idea of an aggressive navy. It was a navy for defense, and up to the time of the Spanish-American war—yes, up to the time of the naval appropriation bill of 1900—every authorization for an American battle ship carried these words, "coast-line battle ship." The policy of Congress had been, up to 1900, to build up what? A navy for defense, a navy to hug the shore line, a navy to defend the coast line. But the Spanish-American war came on and it opened up a larger door of greater opportunity to this country. Then the policy of the American Navy and of Congress changed. What has it been from that time on? To build up a navy for defense; yes, but in recognition of another principle, that the best defense is the ability to make an aggressive offense; and so, from 1900, in every appropriation bill authorizing the building of an American battle ship you will find those words "coast line" stricken out, and the authorization reads, "a seagoing battle ship"—a battle ship capable of fighting the enemy out on the high seas and not simply defending the coast line. So we have been building up this Navy upon that theory since 1900—a navy for defense; yes, and a navy for offense if necessary.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question for information.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That line that was put into the preceding bills about coast-line defense was a fiction, was it not?

Mr. FOSS. No; there has been a change in the policy, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Any of those ships can be sent around the world?

Mr. FOSS. Yes; they can be.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then it was all a fiction, was it not?

Mr. FOSS. No; not necessarily a fiction, but they were built with reference to the policy of a defensive navy, to guard and protect our coast line.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is there any difference between one that is fixed up for coast-line defense and one that is fixed up for deep-sea fighting?

Mr. FOSS. Yes; I think there is quite a difference. The old Monitor, I will say to my friend, the ships that were built at the close of the war and the ships following that were all of the Monitor type, like the Monadnock or the Miantonomoh—they were ships where the freeboard was only a few feet above the water line.

But gradually, as the policy of the Navy has developed, we have given our ships a higher freeboard, we have given them greater speed, recognizing the principle that we were building up a navy that would be able to hold its own out on the high seas as well as along our harbors and coast line.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there have been a great many criticisms which have been made during the last few months about the construction of our ships—criticisms made by people who did not know very much about naval construction and criticisms made by men who ought to know something about it—and I want to say to you that the Committee on Naval Affairs have had important hearings upon this subject of ship construction, and the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs have also had extensive and exhaustive hearings, and I think that everyone who has read those hearings has come to the conclusion that our ships have been honestly and properly constructed during these years and that they will compare favorably with ships constructed by foreign nations during the same period.

There is no man to-day in the American Navy who is so generally regarded as a man of authority, a man of intelligence, a man of ability, and a man of fairness, as Admiral Converse. I should say that he is to-day probably our greatest living naval authority. He has been chief of three of the important bureaus of the Navy Department, the Bureau of Equipment, the Bureau of Ordnance, and the Bureau of Navigation. He has gone through all of this whole matter of press criticism and magazine criticism with reference to the construction of our ships and made a report in which he brushes away these criticisms, which were largely misstatements of facts, as one would brush away the cobwebs and the dust out of a room; and the report which he makes to the Secretary of the Navy in regard to the construction of our ships is that they are not inferior to those in foreign services. He says:

> We have made compromises in our designs of battle ships, because it is impossible to construct a perfect battle ship; such compromises have, perhaps, detracted from the desired perfect ship in some respects, but at the same time have made it possible to improve upon some other existing disadvantages, and, on the whole, the compromises, each and all, have tended toward a nearer approach to the desired perfect finality.
> Other nations have labored and will, like ourselves, continue to labor under this same difficulty in endeavoring to approach as near as possible to that impossibility—a perfect battle ship. In making compromises in the building of our ships, I am satisfied that in every instance all concerned in the work have acted honestly and patriotically, and only with the desire to produce the best ship possible. The result has been in each case, ship by ship and year by year, an improvement upon all that have preceded, and no ship has been built by us inferior to those of any nation designed at the same time.
> The quality of the matériel of our Navy is inferior to none; in quantity of vessels alone are we lacking. With an increase in number of ships the American Navy will have been supplied the only feature necessary to make it second to none in all that tends toward fighting efficiency, and when the stress of actual combat, if such should ever unfortunately come, brings the only really practical test, our country need have no misgivings or fear but that our battle ships will give an excellent account of themselves and prove themselves all that we have designed them for and know them to be.

That is the final expression of Admiral Converse at the end of an exhaustive report upon these criticisms that have appeared in the public press and in public magazines.

In addition to that I might also read you the testimony of the Chief Constructor of the Navy, Admiral Capps, and I want to say to you that in my judgment there has been no man who has been Chief Constructor of the Navy who was abler than the present Chief Constructor. He ranks the equal of any in the world. He has constructed our ships now for the last four or five years, and he has produced ships which have been commented on favorably by the naval authorities of the leading foreign navies.

In a publication which is produced every year of fighting ships called, "Jane's Fighting Ships," an English publication, I read this:

> The extraordinary high figures for United States ships afford food for considerable thought, for both in ships with high-powered guns, or impervious to vital injury at long range, the United States fleet is superior to any other navy in the world. Even by the inclusion of 40-caliber 12-inch types, extinct so far as new ships are concerned, the United States Navy is an extremely good second, and the corresponding lead in invulnerability outside of 7,000 yards is considerably increased.

Again in this publication, after a word on the new designs of the South Carolina and Oregon, the following positive statement is made:

> There is good reason to believe that, taking all things into consideration, the South Carolina type is the best all-big-gun ship yet put in hand.

This is the expression of others. Now, we will have finished in a few years the South Carolina type, and we have gone on building the Delaware and North Dakota, which are better still. I could read you to-day the expressions of naval authorities, of naval architects in other navies of the world, all commendatory of the ships we have been building during these years in which we have been constructing the American Navy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a few months ago when the President of the United States gave the order that sent the fleet through the Strait of Magellan out into the Pacific we heard a great deal of criticism from the public press, particularly in the vicinity of New York. The fleet has passed through the Strait of Magellan out into the Pacific and we hear no criticism now. A fleet of sixteen battle ships, aggregating 223,000 tons, commanded and officered by 14,000 men, the greatest fleet of recent years, which could be duplicated only by England herself, has passed safely from the Atlantic around into the Pacific. We had criticism a few months ago; we have none now because everybody recognizes that it was a good order which the President made. What use is it to build up ships unless we have them in fleet formation? What use is it to build up a navy unless we send that navy out on long cruises where the men can be properly disciplined and trained? What do you think Rojestvensky would have given if he could have made the cruise from Cronstandt to Tsushima in time of peace before he was compelled to do so in time of war? Do you not think his fleet would have been in better condition to meet the enemy in the Sea of Japan if he had made the cruise at least once before in time of peace? This cruise of the American fleet through the Strait of Magellan has been very profitable to the American Navy, because it has disciplined and trained our personnel and our officers. They have been able to find out the weaknesses in our personnel, if any exist, and not only that but it has been of great benefit also to the matériel of the American Navy. They have learned whether our ships were good for anything or not, and the word just coming back to us from Magdalena Bay has been that our ships were even better than when they started on the cruise and the personnel more highly trained and better disciplined than when they first set sail from Hampton Roads.

Another thing which this cruise has called to the attention of the American people is that the American Navy is a national institution; that we are building up a navy for the protection of the Pacific as well as the Atlantic; that we are a two-oceans country; and necessarily, if the American Navy is to be the instrument of our national defense, we must have a two-oceans navy—a fleet upon the Pacific as well as a fleet upon the Atlantic. [Applause.]

This cruise of the Navy into the Pacific has called the attention of the country to another important thing. Wherever that fleet has gone it has been met in every port with the hospitality and the cordiality for which the people of the South American countries are famous. It has tended to cement in closer bonds the relations between our country and the South American Republics. It has given force and efficacy to the words of our able Secretary of State, who made a visit to the leading Republics of South America a few months ago, and it has bound those Republics to us by closer ties than any single thing which could have happened.

The people of South America recognize that we are bound together in one common destiny, and that the American Navy and the American people propose to maintain and uphold the Monroe doctrine and have the ability to do so. Not only has the cruise been beneficial in that respect, but, Mr. Chairman, it has called the attention of the country also to the fact that we are moving westward in our national development. All our history has been along the shores of the Atlantic, all our wars have been along the shores of the Atlantic. Our war for national independence and our war for the freedom of the seas have been largely along the shores of the Atlantic. But we are passing now in our national development from the Atlantic westward to the Pacific. We are beginning to realize what William H. Seward said on the floor of the American Senate fifty years ago, that the Pacific Ocean, its islands and its shores and the great region beyond, would some day be the chief theater of events in the world's great hereafter.

Now, this passing of the fleet from the Atlantic to the Pacific has called to the attention of every American citizen the onward growth of American thought and American development. And let me say to you that no country to-day stands higher in its influence and power in the Pacific than our own nation, and it has come by a long and logical course of events. It was in 1852 that Perry sailed with his little fleet into the Bay of Yeddo and knocked at the gates of old Japan—that Japan which had been closed for hundreds of years to foreign treaty, to foreign commerce, or to foreign intercourse. But Perry lay there knocking, knocking, knocking at the gates of old Japan until finally the gates flew open. Flew open to what? Flew open to commerce, flew open to treaty, flew open to the new and rising nation of Japan. It was an American fleet which opened the door. And a few years ago, when I had the pleasure of visiting Tokyo and was a guest in the Taft party of the secretary of state, the Japanese secretary of state on that occasion alluded to that visit of Commodore Perry more than fifty years ago, and said that was the beginning of the development of the new and modern Japan.

It was only about ten years ago that the United States acquired the Hawaiian Islands, the key of the Pacific, and here the other day this House passed a bill establishing a naval station at Pearl Harbor in recognition of the fact that the Hawaiian Islands are the great key of strategy of the whole Pacific Ocean.

And so, I say, our influence in the development in the Pacific has been moving on. The next stepping-stone in the American development in the Pacific was when the fleet of Dewey left Hongkong and sailed into the Bay of Manila on that bright May morning and destroyed Spanish sovereignty in those islands. The next stepping-stone in the development of American influence was when the Congress of the United States established a government over the Philippine Islands under an American flag, a flag that never waved over any people but to bless and to save. The next stepping-stone in the development of American influence in the Pacific was the splendid and matchless diplomacy of John Hay, late Secretary of State, in insisting upon the preservation of the integrity of China and opening up the ports to the commerce of the world. The next stepping-stone in the development of American influence in the Pacific was when the Congress of the United States authorized the building of the great Panama Canal, which will bring these two great oceans, the Atlantic and the Pacific, into everlasting fellowship. The last stepping-stone in the development of American influence was when the President of the United States invited the representatives of Russia and Japan, who were then engaged in war, to come to our own shores and here, in a Government navy-yard, settle their dispute. And it was so successful that the name and influence of the American nation is greater to-day all over the Pacific than that of any other country in the world. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed one hour. Of course the gentleman is entitled to consume more time, but it is customary to call attention to the fact at the end of one hour.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentlemen upon the other side to go ahead.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, in my absence my colleague on the committee [Mr. PADGETT] has had the responsibility of listening to the appeals of Members for time, and I think he should have the disposition of it under the circumstances. I therefore yield to him to control the time, which, I believe, under the rule under which we are operating, was placed with me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] is recognized to control the time on behalf of the minority.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I will ask that the Chair notify me at the expiration of forty minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Naval Affairs has submitted a bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy for the fiscal year 1909. The committee has given to the consideration of the bill wise, deliberate, careful, and painstaking care and investigation. I come to the discussion of the measure not in a partisan spirit, not as a Democrat, not as a representative of the minority, but as an American citizen. I do not believe that there is any more politics in a battle ship than there is in a sweet potato. I come to discuss the question as a friend of the Navy. I believe it was General Scott whose Whiggery was questioned, and his reply was: "I am a Whig, but I am not a damn-fool Whig." I am, if I may be permitted to paraphrase the expression, a friend of the Navy. [Applause.]

The Committee on Naval Affairs submits this bill to the judgment and to the scrutiny and the careful and painstaking investigation of the House and of the country, and it invites scrutiny and criticism. We believe that our action has been conservative. We believe that we have acted prudently, and at the same time we believe that we have been liberal to the Department. I may say that if there is any criticism which might be leveled at the action of the committee, it is that we have erred on the side of liberality rather than on the side of parsimony.

There has been criticism of the action of the committee. Many of the press of the country have criticised its action, because the committee declined to report four immense battle ships. It has been said that the committee was niggardly and parsimonious. I stand by the action of the committee, and say that we have been liberal. It is said that the United States is rich, and that we ought to spend the money. I desire to call attention to the fact that the only source of revenue the United States has is the taxing power of the Government, and that all the money in the Treasury is tax money. It is not the province, nor is it the duty, of Congress to arrogate to itself the assumption that the United States is rich, and therefore Congress may be extravagant. It is our duty to remember and to legislate along the line of the theory and the policy that every dollar in the Treasury is tax money, levied upon the toil, the labor, the industry, and the production of the American people, and that the Congress is charged with the duty of a wise, a just, and a conservative expenditure of that money. [Applause.]

It is said that we should build ships in order to spend the money in the Treasury, to give employment to labor, to build up industry, and to put money in circulation. I can not subscribe to or indorse that political theory or doctrine. That is an advanced step in the doctrine of paternalism which I do not believe the Congress of the United States is even to-day prepared to take; and I am glad to know that it has never yet been adopted as a policy of the Government, that it shall exercise the taxing power of the Government and lay a tax upon the many in order to distribute it in the employment of the few or the select.

In reply to the criticism that has been made of the committee for its refusal to sanction such a principle and such a policy, I wish to say the committee has repudiated any such principle and policy of government upon which to predicate its report and pass this bill, which it submits to your intelligent consideration.

I desire to call your attention to the fact that ship advocacy—the advocacy of the building of ships—has become an industry in this country. Every year at a certain season much of the press is filled daily and weekly advocating extravagance in the building of ships. It has become an industry. It is not hard to trace the origin or the motive. When we consider that the expenditure each year of $20,000,000 or rather, as claimed by some, $40,000,000 in one year, there is a strong inducement upon the part of some to manufacture public sentiment to go behind the committee and the country to urge us beyond safe and conservative action, and I stand here in defense of the committee to say that your committee, in the consideration of this matter, have not been influenced by the hue and cry that is the product of the advocacy of ship construction, which has become an industry in this country.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him? I heartily agree with what the gentleman has said. Will the gentleman inform us why his committee, pursuing a conservative policy, recommends the construction of two battle ships in place of four, as recommended by the Department, and at the same time recommends the construction of twice the number of submarine torpedo boats recommended by the Department?

Mr. PADGETT. If the gentleman will permit me, I will not take very much time on that. In the first place, eight submarines would cost about two and a half millions of dollars, all told. The Department recommended four and the committee has recommended eight, so that the increase, in round numbers, is one and a quarter million dollars, whereas one single battle ship would cost $10,000,000. In the next place, the President of the United States in his messages heretofore has called attention to the woeful deficiency in and lack of submarines; the Secretary of the Navy has in his report of last year called attention to and emphasized the necessity for more submarines; and, in the next place, our seacoast line requires that we should have some along our coast. But in order that I may explain my position to the gentleman, I will say that personally, for reasons that appear sufficient to me, I voted against the whole submarine proposition in committee; but I did it not because I was opposed to submarines, not because there was anything wrong, because, I say frankly, that I would have voted for the eight submarines had there not been limitations placed upon the purchase. England has thirty-nine, France has forty-one, Russia has twenty-five, and the United States has twelve. England has twenty-one building, France is building sixty-three, and the United States is building seven. So the action of the committee in recommending eight was not extravagant or unreasonable in the light of the above facts.

I want to be entirely frank, and I will say that while I voted against it because I thought the policy of the limitations was improper, I would have voted for the eight had those limitations not been upon the purchase.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. The gentleman understands that I am not criticising him at all.

Mr. PADGETT. I understand.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. But do I understand the gentleman to say that the President now recommends eight of these boats?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not. I said that the President had called attention in his former messages to our deficiency and lack of these matters.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. But at this time he has approved of the Department's estimates of four.

Mr. PADGETT. He does not say anything, as I remember, especially on the subject, except speaking in general terms of the need of these things; but he does not say four, or eight, or any other number.

Now, if I may return to the discussion of this question, I want to call attention to another matter, and that is the exciting of public apprehension. We all remember a year or two ago the racket was worked on Germany, and every fall at the meeting of Congress we were told of the threatening and appalling danger of disaster and conflict with Germany. It was worked and reworked and worked over and over again until it became as frazzled as a last year's whip cracker, and then that was abandoned and they substituted in lieu of it poor old Japan in the Orient. Now, they are working and trying to excite the fears and the apprehensions of the American people over our relations with the Japanese Empire, the same old scheme that was worked with Germany, and they will work it until it becomes frazzled, and then switch off to something else. The committee has withstood this, and submits its action, based upon sound and fundamental reasons.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman excuse me? I have only about forty minutes, and I have consumed nearly twenty minutes of that time. I can not submit to interruption.

I want to speak of the United States. One hundred and twenty-five years we have existed. We began as a Government in a wilderness, and through that one hundred and twenty-five years we have marched on the upward line of progress and developed a civilization, and to-day our ninety millions of people, with their civilization, their production, and their resources, are a nation of power. We have lived these one hundred and twenty-five years; we have escaped all the pitfalls and the snares and the dangers. In our infancy we were not ensnared. In our boyhood we were not engulfed. In our young manhood we were not beaten; but now they come and raise the cry that because we have gotten to be a great and a strong and a mighty and a powerful nation, the greatest and the grandest and the noblest and the most powerful in all the world's history and civilization, therefore we are in danger. I do not subscribe to it and I do not believe it. [Applause.] Who is going to strike us? No nation on the face of the earth is going, voluntarily, to strike the Government of the United States. The very power of our Government, the intelligence of its citizenship, the magnitude of its resources, its manhood, and its civilization stand as a guaranty and the assurance of its protection. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we have reached the time of decision. This is the crisis in the history of the American Congress. The issue is presented to this Congress and must be met and met frankly and met completely and met positively. We have come to the parting of the ways. Heretofore, during the one hundred and twenty-five years of our existence, our growth, and our development, we have pursued the lines of peace. We have followed the path and the policy of progress and the development and the upbuilding of the resources and the wealth and the civilization of our country; but now we are confronted with the direct proposition that we must depart from that; we must depart from the traditions; we must forget the history of the past; we must embark upon a new policy and a new programme, and we must go into a wild and an extravagant naval programme that would dazzle the nations of the earth, and would levy tribute to exhaustion upon the resources and the labor and the production of American citizenship. I stand here to protest against it.

As I said, here is a plain issue. The President recommends four battle ships. The committee has not followed that recommendation. The committee has only submitted two, and I have said that in doing that we have been liberal.

Now, let me for a moment, if you please, present the issue. I read from the minority report by the distinguished member of the committee, Captain HOBSON, filed as a part of the record.

Says he in the minority report:

The only rational basis for a proper national defense is for us to proceed to guarantee control of the sea against any nation of Asia in the Pacific and against any nation of Europe in the Atlantic, both at the same time; whether we realize it or not, this policy is inevitable. We may have to learn our lesson in the school of suffering, amidst humiliation and defeat, but we will yet learn the lesson that, for the elemental purposes of self-preservation in fulfilling the very first duty that we owe to ourselves, America must be supreme on the ocean. There is no escape. We must, as long as present conditions hold, prepare to create and maintain a navy equal to the combined navies of Great Britain and Japan.

That presents to the American people a question that they must meet and determine in this Congress; for if the committee is overridden and if this Congress authorizes four battle ships this session there will be no end to the question in the years to come.

But let us see whether that is needed or not. In 1905 the Secretary of the Navy made his report, and he says:

The aggregate of our battle ships, armored cruisers, coast-defense vessels built, building, and authorized would seem, according to present indications, sufficient to provide for any contingencies within the limit of probabilities.

That was the statement of the Secretary of the Navy in 1905. The President of the United States in 1905 followed it up in his annual message, in which he says:

We have most wisely continued for a number of years to build up our Navy, and it has now reached a fairly high standard of efficiency. This standard of efficiency must not only be maintained, but increased. It does not seem to me necessary, however, that the Navy should, at least in the immediate future, be increased beyond the present number of units. What is now clearly necessary is to substitute efficient for inefficient units as the latter become worn out or as it becomes apparent that they are useless. Probably the result would be attained by adding a single battle ship to our Navy each year, the superseded or worn-out vessels being laid up or broken up as they are being replaced.

The President stated that one battle ship a year would be sufficient. But that is not all. He followed up that message in 1906 with a similar message reaffirming his statement. He says:

I do not ask that we continue to increase our Navy. I ask merely that it be maintained at its present strength, and this can be done only if we replace the obsolete and out-worn ships by new and good ones the equal of any afloat in any navy.

And then, speaking of the worn-out, antiquated, double-turret monitors, he says:

All these ships should be replaced by others. This can be done by the well-settled programme of providing for the building each year of at least one first-class battle ship equal in size and speed to any that any nation is at the same time building. The armament presumably consists of as large a number as possible of very heavy guns of one caliber, together with smaller guns to repel torpedo attack.

Now, that policy all at once is sought to be overturned, and the enormous programme thrown upon Congress of four battle ships, to cost $40,000,000, in one year.

Let me call your attention to another matter, if you please. What is the condition of our Navy? I say that we have a magnificent navy. I hold here the official sheet issued by the Office of Naval Intelligence, of the date of November 1, giving the naval strength of the powers—Great Britain, France, the United States, Germany, Japan, and other nations. At the present time the United States stands second, England stands first, France stands third, Germany fourth, and Japan fifth. But if the programme now building is completed England will be first, France second, the United States third, Germany fourth, and Japan fifth.

But let me call attention to the tonnage. The United States has built and is building 771,758 tons; Japan, 451,320 tons, or the United States has an excess of 320,000 tons.

At the date of this statement—four or five have been completed since—the United States had twenty-two battle ships built and Japan eleven. The United States had seven building and Japan two.

But I want to call attention to another matter, for I must hurry on. The Secretary of the Navy, when he was before the committee, was asked with reference to the officers. He stated that with the present complement of ships on a peace basis we were 1,686 officers short, and on a war basis, in order to officer the present complement of ships built and building, we were 1,846 officers short. He stated further that Annapolis was graduating each year from 180 to 200, and that we were losing each year by death and retirement about forty, so that we are gaining about 150 officers a year—so that, on a peace basis, with the present complement of ships, it would take us eleven years to get officers enough to officer the ships that we now have, not including the two that we have authorized in this bill and those that we may authorize in the years to come.

Now, I ask you what is the common sense, what is the common justice and honesty, if you please, of going on building ships ahead of the officers when we have no officers to officer them? It takes as long to train an officer as it does to build a ship. It takes longer, if you please, to train and educate an officer competent to manage a ship than it takes to build your ship. We are 1,686 officers short to-day, and it would take eleven years to catch up. What is the necessity of this great haste? But I can answer that question, if you please, by the President's own message, for the President has spoken upon that question. Hear what the President says in his message of 1905:

No fighting ship of the first class should ever be laid up, save for necessary repairs, and her crew should be kept constantly exercised on the high seas, so that she may stand at the highest point of perfection. To put a new and untrained crew upon the most powerful battle ship and send it out to meet a formidable enemy is not only to invite, but to insure disaster and disgrace. To improvise crews at the outbreak of a war, so far as the serious fighting craft are concerned, is absolutely hopeless. If the officers and men are not thoroughly skilled in and have not been thoroughly trained to their duties, it would be far better to keep the ships in port during hostilities than to send them against a formidable opponent, for the result could only be that they would be either sunk or captured.

In 1906 he reaffirms and reasserts that statement. But that is not all. Admiral Winslow was before our committee. He is the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation. He was asked to state what was the shortage in enlisted men, and he stated that upon the present complement of ships now built and building we were 22,701 men short. To meet that in this very bill your committee has authorized an additional enlistment of 6,000 men at an additional annual cost of at least $3,216,000. And that would still leave us 16,701 men short—not counting the two ships that we authorize in this bill. With this condition of affairs, I appeal to you as sensible, thinking, patriotic citizens, who are to dispose of the trust money of the taxpayers of the American people, what is the wisdom or the righteousness of this pellmell rushing into the construction of ships, when we have neither the officers nor the men to man them? [Applause.]

I put that question to the Secretary of the Navy. I asked him:

Mr. Secretary, does not the large shortage of officers which you mention argue that we might hold up building battle ships for a while?

Secretary METCALF. I don't think so, because we need the battle ships. We can put some of the big cruisers in reserve and take the officers and men from those cruisers and put them on the battle ships.

Doubtless he had overlooked what the President had said would almost be treason, to tie up our fighting ships, to put improvised crews upon them if it became necessary to use them.

But I want to call attention very hastily to what we have done and what we are doing. I want to call attention to what the present committee at the present Congress has done. The present bill carries in round numbers—and I will use round numbers and not give the odd dollars and cents—$103,967,000. We have already passed two deficiency bills, $3,611,000. We have authorized in the Pearl Harbor bill an appropriation of $650,000. We have reported a bill for two steel dry docks, $3,500,000. We have reported a bill authorizing the purchase of three steam colliers, $1,575,000. We have reported a bill for the increase of the Marine Corps 1,500 men and officers at an increased annual expenditure of $957,168—amounting in the aggregate to $114,261,000.

But that is not all. In addition to that we have authorized two battle ships of $19,000,000, ten torpedo boats at $8,000,000, eight submarine boats at $3,500,000, three subsurface boats at $445,000, Pearl Harbor project authorized to be contracted for,

$2,050,000, and the estimates to complete the dredging of the channel of the river as stipulated in that bill, though not limited, estimated at $2,500,000, making $35,495,000 additional; or, if you please, a total of $149,756,476—that is at this Congress—not counting the multitude of little bills of several thousand dollars each that I have not taken the pains nor the time to tabulate. In addition, Admiral Capps states that in the fiscal years 1910 and 1911 on existing contracts we will have to appropriate for armor and armament for increase of the Navy, $36,610,048.

Let me call your attention to another matter. In 1883, for the first time, the naval appropriation reached approximately $15,000,000; in 1888 it reached, for the first time, $26,000,000; in 1892 it reached, for the first time, $31,000,000, and in 1897 it was $31,000,000. In 1900, for the first time, the annual appropriation bill reached $53,000,000. Since 1905 it has not been less than one hundred millions, and now, as I have shown you, this Congress is providing appropriations and authorizations for $150,000,000. Is it not time that we were stopping to think and to consider and to reflect? The American people are not mad on this subject. They expect wise and conservative action of this Congress. [Applause.]

It is said that we did not follow the recommendations of the Department. What did the Department submit? They submitted regular estimates of $128,846,000, and they submitted estimates for increase of the Navy of $69,370,000, making what they asked for in estimates $198,116,000, leaving out the Pearl Harbor projects and these other matters that have been mentioned, which I will not take time to reiterate.

Was not the committee to exercise some judgment and put in the pruning knife somewhere? But let me direct your attention again: The total estimates submitted for the Government, exclusive of the estimates for the Post-Office Department, amounted to $766,508,000. The estimates for the Post-Office Department amounted to $230,000,000, making in round numbers a billion of dollars of estimates submitted. The appropriations last year were $929,000,000. This year we are going to reach the billion-dollar mark in one Congress. This very morning the deficiency of revenue was $39,460,763 since the first day of last July. It is said we have $250,000,000 in the Treasury. Yes; but we have used $39,000,000 of it to pay current expenses on a deficiency of an average of about $4,500,000 a month.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, as requested, that the gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. There are some other matters that I should be very glad indeed to refer to, and I will encoach upon five minutes more of the time and take the liberty of doing that. Another matter I want to call attention to is this: Another policy that is outlined in the minority report that is vital and presents a question to be determined by this Congress is in these words:

> Many are opposed to an adequate programme because it is expensive. The truth is, the more expensive the better, for while other nations have gained their advantage by taking men away from work and organizing armies, we have left our men at work and have the advantage of greater resources, so that we can afford the expense of a great navy and they can not. The whole question is a relative one. The more expensive we make naval power, the quicker military nations that contest our rights to supremacy on the sea must drop behind. The more burdensome we make the carrying of great armaments, the quicker the military nations staggering under the loads will be willing to join us in evolving an adequate system of collective protection, which would enable us all to give up these armaments. The true way to hasten the disarmament of the nations is to speedily increase the burden of the armaments.

That is the logic of the minority report. I frankly, freely, and fully confess that I do not subscribe to it. The ethics of that report is this: A father says to his son, "My son, I am opposed to gambling; gambling is wrong; we want to break up gambling, and as there are some fellows in the community who will gamble, you get to be an expert gambler and win all their money and break them and then they can not gamble any longer." [Applause.] I have always heard the lack of money was a good reason for not gambling. Now, then, one other proposition in regard to comparing our Navy with the navy of Japan.

I have made a synopsis here of the fighting ships of the United States and Japan. The United States had 22 battle ships built at the time these figures were made. We have now 26, but at the time we had 22, Japan had 12. The United States had building 7, Japan 3. On these battle ships the United States had 32 13-inch guns, Japan none. The United States had 104 12-inch guns, Japan 88; 10-inch guns, the United States had none, Japan 40; 8-inch guns, the United States had 144, Japan none; 7-inch guns, the United States had 88, Japan none; 6-inch guns, the United States had 160, Japan 85. That is the battle-ship armament. Now take the armored cruisers. The United States had 13 armored cruisers built, Japan 11. The United States had building 2, and Japan 2; Japan had 1 projected. The armament of those ships were, 12-inch guns, Japan 20, the United States none; 10-inch guns, the United States 16, Japan 9; 8-inch guns, United States none, Japan 56; 6-inch guns, the United States 190, Japan 120; 5-inch guns, the United States 22, Japan none; and yet I read further in this minority report this statement:

> These Japanese Dreadnoughts carry 4 12-inch and 12 10-inch guns, or 16 great guns each. The best of our ships only carry 4 great guns each. It is conservative to evaluate each of these Japanese Dreadnoughts as the equivalent of 4 of our average vessels.

The gentleman forgets to state that the American ships have eight 8-inch guns each. That is not stated in that proposition. He says that one of these Japanese would be equal to four of the American ships. Now, let us suppose a condition where one of these Japanese ships attacked four American ships, the Japanese ship with sixteen guns could use four guns only on each American ship, and in return the four ships of the American Navy would have sixteen 12-inch guns and thirty-two 8-inch guns with which to fight that Japanese ship. Besides, it is hardly fair to compare the latest ships of the Japanese Dreadnought class with our old style of ships. The comparison should be made with the American Dreadnoughts of the Delaware type, having ten 12-inch guns. Moreover, the 8-inch guns are effective and efficient guns and would do good service. The 8-inch guns are not negligible factors on our ships and should not be omitted in estimating their fighting power. Does any man think that would be an equal contest on the part of the Japanese ship?

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as I have given the gentleman one hour, which is more time than anybody else, I can not now yield. I have already trespassed now seven minutes on time that I gave to some others, but I felt the importance of this question as a member of the committee and thought I should take a little more time.

The magnitude, the power, the grandeur of the American nation and the American people have been counted for naught. Our resources, in this minority report, have been converted into liabilities, and our strength has been counted simply as weakness. Against these chimerical ghosts and phantasms, erected and imagined, as a boy going through a graveyard whistling to keep up his courage, I place the manhood and the patriotism and the intelligence and the courage, the civilization of the American people; and these vain imaginations can not stand at the bar of the judgment of the sober, thinking people of the American public. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, our Government has taken an active and prominent part in The Hague conferences and made many professions of its sincere desire for the promotion of peace, international arbitration and in favor of the limitation of armaments. We have declared to the world that the cruise of our fleet to the Pacific and around the world was friendly to all powers and had no element of hostile demonstration or intent. In that we are sincere.

But I ask in all seriousness if we should now, under these circumstances, reverse the policies enunciated by the President in his 1905 and 1906 messages and enter upon this new and fundamentally different policy and authorize the construction of four immense battle ships, could we make our professions square with our acts, and would not other nations have cause at least to suspect the sincerity of our professions?

Mr. Chairman, Congress has other cares and obligations to meet beside the military. I may add that the Army appropriation bill carries $98,000,000, the fortifications bill $12,000,000, and the pension bill carries $151,000,000. These added to the naval budget before mentioned shows the enormous sums of money we are spending by reason of the military and naval establishments of this country. Let me draw a contrast.

For the great Department of Agriculture, which directly touches so many of our people and is doing such a wonderful work for our people, the total appropriation for all the work of this great Department so far proposed for the next year is only the sum of $14,981,346—the cost of one and a half battle ships. Comment is unnecessary. Yet last year the value of farm products exceeded the fabulous sum of $3,000,000,000, sustaining the business and enterprise of the country.

Our rivers and harbors are deserving of and are demanding consideration and improvement. There is the great Lakes-to-the-Gulf project, in which millions of our people and many of the great interior States are vitally interested. There is the great project of the Beaufort Canal and the draining of the Dismal Swamp, in which the Atlantic States are interested. The improvement of the waterways of the great West and of the Pacific slope are worthy of the consideration and help of the Government.

There are the great questions of the preservation of our forests and sources of water supply—for illustration, the White Mountain and Appalachian Forest Reserves. But all of them are denied consideration and help on the ground of lack of money and the cost of the enterprises. All over the country there is a desire for Government buildings for the accommodation of Government work, and yet the same cry—lack of money. But I will not multiply citations. Let us do justice to the Navy. Let every proper consideration be given to its needs, but let us not lose our heads and forget our other duties and obligations.

In a wise, conservative, yet broad and American spirit, let us consider and discharge our whole duty.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether it will be done or not, and I do not ask to violate the rules, but if it is going to be granted to others, I want the right to extend my remarks on this bill in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask that it be extended to all Members who speak on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the committee can not give unanimous consent. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on this subject in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this subject in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on this subject in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. FAVROT].

Mr. FAVROT. Mr. Chairman, the limitation of my time on this vitally important question necessitates brevity in my remarks.

Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the arguments urged against the building of four battle ships are, in the main, two. The first is the plea of economy. Mr. Chairman, I believe in economy as much as does any gentleman upon the floor of this House, but not in economy on the nation's defenses or at the expense of the nation's safety or the nation's honor. I stand, Mr. Chairman, for an economical administration of public affairs, but when the safety of the country or the honor and the glory of that flag is at stake I do not believe that the question of expense should for one moment be considered. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the second argument against the increase to four battle ships, as I understand it, is that we need a navy no greater than is necessary to repel invasion. Grant, for the sake of argument, that our present Navy is sufficient for that purpose; we still need a greater navy. We have assumed certain obligations—obligations on both oceans, obligations which we can not repudiate, and from the performance of which we can not shrink with honor. The first, the greatest, and, I may say, the most sacred of those obligations is the enforcement of the Monroe doctrine, and I do not believe that there is a gentleman upon this floor who would advocate the repudiation of that doctrine or who does not believe that it is our duty, at all hazards, to uphold it. [Applause.] This Government can not permit a violation of the Monroe doctrine with safety or with honor and without humiliation. And, mind you, that doctrine is unrecognized by international law, is unrecognized by treaty. Its only force is our ability to enforce it. It is simply a threat, a declaration to Europe that "if you attempt to seize upon any American territory we will by force prevent you;" and unless we are prepared to carry that threat into execution, unless we are prepared to make that threat effective, the Monroe doctrine becomes mere bombast and will be respected as such.

And, Mr. Chairman, with the building of the Panama Canal the importance of the enforcement of the Monroe doctrine with reference to the islands in and the territory bordering upon the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean Sea becomes accentuated. Not only must that canal be protected, not only must that canal be kept open, but no foreign power must be permitted to secure a naval base within striking distance of that canal. And, mark you, the Monroe doctrine can not be enforced by remaining upon the defensive, by simply guarding our own coast, by simply repelling invasion. The territory to be protected is away from our shores. That doctrine must be enforced away from our shores, and in order to enforce it we must have a navy, and a navy large enough and strong enough to cope with that of any power which seeks to trespass upon it.

Mr. Chairman, we have assumed certain obligations in the Pacific; unwisely, I believe, but nevertheless we have assumed them. We have acquired territory far distant from our shores; and no matter what disposition we may finally make of those islands, as long as we hold them we must protect them. We may at some time in the future give the people of those islands their independence. We may sell those islands, but as long as they are ours we can not without national humiliation and national disgrace permit them to be taken from us. And even if we give these people their independence, we must guarantee that independence and must protect them in it. And I beg leave to remind the gentlemen who oppose a larger increase in our Navy that these far-distant possessions can not be defended, can not be protected by simply repelling invasion from our own coasts.

But, Mr. Chairman, our present Navy is not even sufficient for our own protection. As compared with other powers we have no army, and for the national defense are absolutely dependent upon the Navy. Admit, for the sake of the argument, that our present entire Navy is on a parity with that of France, Germany, or Japan. Our geographical position is such as to necessitate two navies. Our situation differs from that of any other power, European or Asiatic, except it be Russia, to which it is somewhat similar. Not only have we the Monroe doctrine to uphold in both the Atlantic and Pacific, and our island possessions to defend in the Pacific, but these United States front upon both oceans, with about 14,000 miles of foreign waters between our coasts. To transfer a fleet from one coast to the other, even during time of peace and under the most favorable conditions, requires a period of about three months, and in time of war, with every neutral port closed, with the consequent difficulties in coaling, it will be far more difficult and will require a far longer time. On the other hand, Japan's entire navy is in the Pacific. She has no Atlantic interests. Germany's entire coast line of only 800 miles is on the Atlantic, and her whole naval force is in Atlantic waters. Therefore, in comparing our Navy with that of Japan, the only proper basis of comparison is our Pacific Squadron as against Japan's entire navy; and in comparing our Navy with that of Germany, the only proper basis of comparison is our Atlantic Squadron as against Germany's full naval force.

Let me illustrate: If before December last war had broken out with Japan, before our Atlantic fleet could have reached our Pacific coast our island possessions would have been taken from us and our own Pacific coast ravaged, if not invaded. If to-day, Mr. Chairman, while that fleet is far distant in the Pacific, war should come with any European power, we would find the 10,000 miles of our Atlantic coast guarded by only five armored vessels, only two of them battle ships, which would soon be destroyed, and that coast and all the great cities upon it would be at the mercy of the enemy; and before our fleet could reach the scene of action, even if with the help of Providence we should have escaped invasion, the damage done would have been tenfold more than the cost of the combined navies of the world.

But, Mr. Chairman, even if our entire Navy is now upon a parity with those of France, Germany, and Japan, unless we more rapidly increase our Navy it will not long remain so. The naval programme of every power is such—they are building at such a rate—that in a very short time they will have far outstripped us. France has thirty-one armored vessels and is building six; Germany has twenty-seven armored vessels, is building five, and is about to lay down eight more, four this year and four next year. Japan has twenty-four armored vessels and has nearly completed four more, two of them of a type which when completed would equal any four of ours, and they have authorized the construction of seven more—and, mark you, these new vessels are of a class which in tonnage and armament far outclass any of the vessels of our present Navy. Mark you, further, that it requires us a year or two longer to build a battle ship than it does any other naval power. So it will be seen, Mr. Chairman, that unless we make more rapid increase in our Navy we will soon fall from the rank of a first-class to that of a second-class power. If we concentrate every vessel we possess in the Atlantic, leaving the Pacific coast unguarded, our Navy will be far inferior to that of Germany; and if we concentrate our entire Navy in the Pacific, leaving the Atlantic unguarded, our naval force will be far inferior to that of Japan.

Mr. Chairman, it is said here that we are a peaceable people, that because we have no designs on others we are not liable to engage in war. War is liable to be forced upon us at any time. Europe does not love us, not only because of our institutions, but because of our commercial supremacy. This is a commercial age, and commercial rivalry is the most fruitful source of trouble. Territory is seized and the weak are conquered now, not so much for mere expansion of territory, not so much that subject people may pay tribute to a nation sovereign, but that a subject people may buy a nation's goods; and unless we are prepared to enforce the Monroe doctrine, the temptation to some commercial power to seize territory to the south of us upon this continent and thereby extend its trade will be well-nigh irresistible.

Mr. Chairman, the aim of every commercial nation of Europe and of Japan is to divide China into zones of influence, each with a commercial monopoly, with absolute control of commerce within its respective zone. We stand for the open door. Our commerce and our hope of commercial development and of commercial expansion demand it; but now, unless we are strong enough to make our wishes respected, how long think you will that door remain open to us?

And, Mr. Chairman, over and above all, in that inevitable conflict between the white and the yellow race, in that struggle for mastery which is bound to come, upon us will devolve the duty of maintaining the supremacy of the white race in the Pacific, and we must be prepared to perform that duty. That is our burden. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that not only patriotism but common sense and the honor and the safety of this country imperatively demand a more rapid increase in our Navy. The refusal to provide for such increase may now seem economy, but if war should in the future come upon us—and it will come—it will have been worse than folly; it will have been almost treason; almost a crime!

Now, Mr. Chairman, if I have any time left I yield it to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN].

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman is not here at this moment, and I ask the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss], to occupy some time.

Mr. Chairman, I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, that great agnostic, brilliant orator and scholar, Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, on one occasion is said to have declared:

I am aware that there is a prejudice against any man who manufactures alcohol. I believe that from the time it issues from the coiled and poisonous worm in the distillery until it empties into the jaws of death, dishonor, and crime it demoralizes everybody that touches it from its source to where it ends. I do not believe anybody can contemplate the object without being prejudiced against the liquor crime. All we have to do, gentlemen, is to think of the wrecks on either bank of the stream of death, of the suicides, of the insanity, of the ignorance, of the destitution, of the little children tugging at the faded and withered breast of weeping and despairing mothers, of wives asking for bread, of the men of genius it has wrecked, the men struggling with imaginary serpents, produced by this devilish thing; and when you think of the jails, of the almshouses, of the asylums, of the prisons, of the scaffolds upon either bank, I do not wonder that every thoughtful man is prejudiced against this damned stuff called "alcohol." Intemperance cuts down youth in its vigor, manhood in its strength, old age in its weakness. It breaks the father's heart, bereaves the doting mother, extinguishes natural affection, erases conjugal love, blots out filial attachment, blights parental hopes, brings down mourning age in sorrow to the grave. It produces weakness, not strength; sickness, not health; death, not life. It makes wives widows, children orphans, fathers fiends; and all of them paupers and beggars. It feeds rheumatism, invites cholera, imports pestilence, and embraces consumption. It covers the land with idleness, misery, and crime. It fills your jails, supplies your almshouses, and demands your asylums. It engenders controversies, fosters quarrels, and cherishes riots. It crowds your penitentiaries, and furnishes victims for your scaffolds. It is the life blood of the gambler, the element of the burglar, the prop of the highwayman, and support of the midnight incendiary. It countenances the liar, respects the thief, esteems the blasphemer. It violates obligation, reverences fraud and honors infamy. It defames benevolence, hates love, scorns virtue, and slanders innocence. It incites the father to butcher his helpless offspring, helps the husband to massacre his wife, and the child to grind the parricidal ax. It burns up men, consumes women, detests life, curses God, despises heaven. It suborns witnesses, nurses perjury, defiles the jury box, and stains the judicial ermine. It degrades the citizen, debases the legislator, dishonors the statesman, and disarms the patriot. It brings shame, not honor; misery, not safety; despair, not hope; sorrow, not happiness, and with the malevolence of a fiend it calmly surveys its frightful desolation and unsatiated havoc. It poisons felicity, kills peace, ruins morals, blights confidence, slays reputation, and wipes out national honor, then curses the world and laughs at its ruin. It does all that and more. It murders the soul. It is the sum of all villainies, the father of all crimes, the mother of all abominations, the devil's best friend, and God's worst enemy.

Sir, was anything ever more truly or eloquently said? Has he added a lurid color to the picture that should not be there? It is a picture drawn by a master mind. It is not maudlin sentiment. It is his ripe judgment of the evils of alcohol, formed by a long life of wise observation.

Mr. Chairman, the problem of the regulation of the whisky traffic and its absolute prohibition has agitated the minds of the people of the United States for the last fifteen years more than any other one question.

No careful observer of the times will deny that public sentiment against the whisky traffic is growing stronger and stronger every day. Will any Member sitting before me deny this? Has not this mighty sentiment against the traffic and the saloon reached this Capital City and this legislative hall? Only a few years ago barrooms were maintained in this splendid Capitol building. Now not a drop of whisky is allowed to be sold anywhere within its mighty confines. The Congress took this step against the traffic. A few years ago the Army canteen flourished among our soldier boys, but not so now. This Congress has forbidden it.

In 1906 Congress passed a law requiring each collector of internal revenue to place conspicuously in his office for public inspection a list of all persons who have paid a special license tax in his district and to furnish a copy of such list of persons to any prosecuting officer of any State, county, or municipality upon demand by such officer.

The Hepburn-Dolliver bill passed this House by almost a unanimous vote on January 27, 1903, and died in the Senate. I verily believe, sir, that if a vote can be secured on that measure by the present membership of this House, it will pass again by a practically unanimous vote; and if it does so pass, it will not die so easily in the other end of the Capitol.

The minister of God thunders against the traffic because it destroys morality and blights human souls; business men oppose it because it retards prosperity and undermines business ability; the economist condemns it because it destroys $2,000,000,000 annually and gives nothing in return therefor. Even the owners of saloons demand sober men for bartenders. Great labor organizations are against the traffic because it brings poverty to so many of their members and unhappiness to so many homes. In fact, there is scarcely a class of men that will now defend the open saloon.

Those individuals who defend the saloon do so largely on the ground that it is the only way to control the traffic; not that the saloon is a good thing, but that it is the best solution of this vexing question. I have no fault to find with the man who honestly and sincerely believes this, but I do think that his judgment is faulty.

Mr. Chairman, the courts of the United States almost universally have condemned the whisky traffic. I have only time to quote from one judicial tribunal, and that is the Supreme Court of the United States, the greatest law body on earth:

We can not shut out of view the fact, within the knowledge of all, that the public health, the public morals, and the public safety is endangered by the general use of intoxicating liquors; nor the fact established by statistics accessible to everyone that the idleness, disorder, pauperism, and crime existing in the country are largely traceable to this evil.

This is the sentiment of the nine eminent judges who constituted this high court when this opinion in Mugler v. Kansas (123 U. S., 205) was written by Mr. Justice Harlan.

And, sir, I will pause long enough to quote from the supreme court of Kansas:

Probably no greater source of crime and sorrow has ever existed than social-drinking saloons. Social drinking is the evil of evils. It has probably caused more drunkenness and has made more drunkards than all other causes combined, and drunkenness is a pernicious source of all kinds of sorrow and crime. It is a Pandora's box, sending forth innumerable ills and woes, shame and disgrace, indigence, poverty, and want, social happiness destroyed, domestic broils and bickerings engendered, social ties sundered, homes made desolate, families scattered, heartrending partings, sin, crime, and untold sorrows, not even hope left, but everything lost, an everlasting farewell to all true happiness and to all nobler aspirations rightfully belonging to every true and virtuous human being.

Let it be understood, Mr. Chairman, that no man has the inherent or natural right to sell whisky. The right to sell it depends on the will of the people, for the United States Supreme Court, in the case of Crowley v. Christensen (137 U. S., 86) has declared:

There is no inherent right in a citizen to thus sell intoxicating liquors by retail. (It is not a privilege of a citizen of a State or of the United States.)

Therefore no barkeeper can cry that he is deprived of any inherent or natural right when the people, by their vote, tell him that he must not and shall not sell whisky within the borders of a county or State.

Abraham Lincoln once said:

The liquor traffic is a cancer in society, eating out its vitals and threatening destruction, and all attempts to regulate it will aggravate the evil. There must be no attempts to regulate the cancer. It must be eradicated. Not a root must be left behind (for until this is done all classes must continue in danger of becoming victims of strong drink).

Gladstone, once the great premier of England, said:

The drink traffic has caused more suffering, misery, and death than all the famines, pestilences, and wars during the nineteenth century.

United States Senator Carmack, of Tennessee, recently said:

The saloon, by its insolence, its arrogance, its persistent lawlessness, has forced the issue upon the people, and the people must meet it. (It refuses to be reformed. It must therefore be destroyed. It has proclaimed by its conduct that it would die rather than obey the law. In doing so it has left but one course for self-respecting and law-respecting people. The time will come when men not now young will live to see the day when there will not be a saloon in any land where men go to church and children go to school.)

The churches are against the liquor traffic, as will witness the following resolution passed by the Methodist Church in its North Carolina annual conference:

We stand against the sale and manufacture of alcoholic liquors anywhere in the State of North Carolina, and for State prohibition. (We most earnestly hope that our lawmakers will procure the enactment of such laws as will fully protect us against the importation into prohibitory territory of any alcoholic stimulants from points without as well as within the State.)

The Baptist Church of North Carolina has also placed itself on record time and again against the whisky traffic. Here is the resolution adopted by the Baptist State convention without a dissenting vote:

We wish again to declare our uncompromising hostility to the liquor traffic as the great enemy of the peace and good morals of the people, the well-being of the home, and the work of the gospel among men. We congratulate the people of North Carolina on the splendid progress made in temperance in the last ten years, on the rising tide at this time to drive the traffic out of the State.

The Presbyterian, Christian, Episcopal, Lutheran, and other churches in North Carolina are equally opposed to the liquor traffic.

Bishop Fitzgerald not long ago stated:

The saloon is the chief and most audacious lawbreaker of the age. It is the arch destroyer of all that is dear to man. It is sleepless, restless, insatiable, mighty.

The great railway systems of the country oppose intemperance. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad forbids intoxicants at any time, either on or off duty, by dispatchers, trainmasters, engineers, firemen, and conductors; and this great system declares that it has taken this step "for the protection of life, property, and good service." Other great railway systems of the United States have adopted similar rules and will not employ any person who uses intoxicants.

During the recent special session of the legislature in North Carolina a leading cotton-mill man of the State said to the house committee on liquor traffic:

Gentlemen, it is for you to say which you will encourage in North Carolina—cotton mills or liquor mills.

I honestly believe that the number of cotton-mill owners who favor the liquor traffic in the great State from which I come—and it has more cotton mills than any other State in the Union—can be counted on the fingers of one hand. I am equally sincere in the belief that less than 5 per cent of the honest, industrious, home-building cotton-mill operatives in North Carolina are in favor of the liquor traffic. It is the one great curse among them, and they are using their best efforts to stamp it out of existence.

The famous labor leader in England, John Burns, member of Parliament, recently declared to a great audience of workingmen in London, in discussing the liquor question:

I deem it my duty to say that but for drink and its concomitant evils our problem would be smaller and our remedies more effective.

I believe that the best and most simple remedy for drink is abstinence, but this must be supplemented by local or legislative action. One drink-cursed district, Liverpool, has since 1889 added 78,000 to its population, reduced its police drunkenness cases from 16,000 to 4,180, its crimes from 926 to 552 per 100,000, its policemen by 100, at a saving of £8,000 to the rates by the simple remedy of having got rid of 345 licensed places in eleven years. Thirty thousand friendly societies, with 12,000,000 members, have accumulated £40,000,000 in fifty years, or as much only as the nation spent on drink in any three months of last year.

No one knows better than the laboring man the blighting, desolating effects of whisky or to what depths of misery and shame it will drag him.

The following story is taken from one of the daily papers as a news item:

A man on being asked by some companions to go into a saloon and have a drink with them said:

"I won't drink any to-day, boys."

"What's the matter with you, old man?" asked one. "If you've quit, what's up?"

"Well, boys, I'll tell you. Yesterday I was in Chicago. I called on a customer of mine down on Clark street, who keeps a pawn shop in connection with his other business. While I was there a young man came in, wearing threadbare clothes and looking as hard as they make 'em. He had a little package in his hand. He unwrapped it and handed it to the pawnbroker, saying 'Give me 10 cents.' And what do you suppose it was? It was a pair of baby's shoes, little things with the bottoms only a trifle soiled, as though they had been worn only once or twice. 'Where did you get these?' asked the pawnbroker. 'Got 'em at home,' replied the man. 'My wife bought 'em for the baby. Give me 10 cents for 'em; I want to get a drink.' 'You had better take them back to your wife; the baby will need them,' said the pawnbroker. 'No, she won't; she's dead—baby died last night.' And then the poor fellow laid his head on the show case and cried like a child.

"Boys, I have a baby at home, and I'll not take a drink with you to-day."

Mr. Chairman, the merchant opposes the whisky traffic not only on moral grounds, but because he has learned that the saloon is an inveterate foe to thrift and industry and lessens the capacity of his debtor to meet his obligation.

The farmer is opposed to the liquor traffic. He takes the high moral ground that he has no right to license a system whose chief business it is to destroy character, increase crime, enlarge the pauper class, and darken homes. He opposes it on another ground—out in the rural districts, far from the protecting hand of policemen and sheriff, he knows the danger to his wife and daughter from the drunken negro whose blood is heated and whose brain is unbalanced by the use of bad liquor. The negro seems to have inherited an appetite for intoxicants, and, like the tiger when he tastes blood, the negro likewise when he becomes intoxicated becomes enraged. Where is the farmer in the East or in the West who would vote to establish a barroom in his community where every Saturday evening the negroes and trifling whites could congregate for their drunken revels and, dispersing during the afternoon and night, make it unsafe for men and positively dangerous for women to move along the public highways? Every mother and daughter would be filled with fright whenever she saw a drunken negro reeling and staggering along the highway near her home, and her first impulse would be to flee to her room and barricade the door. Let the farmers consult their wives and daughters as to whether or not the open saloon should exist in any country district of our fair State. For that matter, if you will leave the vote to the women of our State as to whether or not the saloon should exist in town or country, I guarantee the whisky traffic would not have one ballot in its favor.

Mr. Chairman, more than one-half of this great Republic of 80,000,000 people has already adopted prohibition laws. The following Commonwealths, aggregating a population of more than 9,000,000 people, have adopted absolute State prohibition, to wit: Alabama, Georgia, Kansas, Maine, North Dakota, and Oklahoma.

There are also fourteen other States in which prohibition campaigns are now being carried on, and each of these States is expected to adopt prohibition. I refer to the following States: South Carolina, Mississippi, Florida, Connecticut, Vermont, New Hampshire, District of Columbia, Tennessee, Arkansas, Iowa, Michigan, Missouri, Delaware, and North Carolina.

I believe that in less than two years prohibition will be adopted by Kentucky, Texas, West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Nebraska, Massachusetts, and South Dakota.

The liquor traffic is already outlawed in the following localities: Fifty counties out of 75 in Arkansas, 175 towns and cities in California, 50 towns and cities in Colorado, 75 out of 125 towns and cities in Connecticut, one-half of the State of Delaware, 30 out of 45 counties in Florida, 650 towns and cities in Illinois, 140 towns in Indiana, the entire State of Iowa except 25 cities, 90 out of 119 counties in Kentucky, 20 out of 59 counties in Louisiana, 15 out of 24 counties in Maryland, 125 out of 175 towns in Massachusetts, 400 towns and cities in Michigan, 400 towns and cities in Minnesota, 71 out of 75 counties in Mississippi, 84 out of 115 counties in Missouri, 250 towns and cities in Nebraska, 200 towns and cities in New Jersey, 700 towns and cities in New York, 20 towns and cities in little Rhode Island, 500 towns and cities in Ohio, 600 towns and cities and 20 counties in Pennsylvania, the entire State of South Carolina except about a dozen places, 70 out of 96 counties in Tennessee, 120 out of 246 counties in Texas, 50 out of 106 counties in Virginia, 40 out of 54 counties in West Virginia, 50 towns and cities in the State of Washington, 300 towns and cities in Wisconsin, and about three-fourths of North Carolina.

Sir, what a splendid territory is all this over which floats the white flag of prohibition!

The people of the United States are waking up to the fact that the whisky traffic is the most ruthless and reckless destroyer of property, character, and life that exists in our midst. Hon. Carroll D. Wright, while United States Commissioner of Labor, said:

I have looked into a thousand homes of the working people of Europe; I do not know how many in this country. I have tried to find the best and the worst; and while, as I say, the worst exists, and as bad as under any system, or as bad as in any age, I have never had to look beyond the inmates to find the cause; and in every case, so far as my observation goes, drunkenness was at the bottom of the misery, and not the industrial system or the industrial conditions surrounding the men and their families.

What a terrible arraignment is this! Is it anything short of remarkable that the people will license and tolerate a thing which is constantly destroying and tearing down what thrifty, energetic, and Christian people are building up?

Intoxicating liquors each year cost the people of the United States more than the price of their annual product of cotton, corn, gold, silver, lead, and precious stones. The tariff taxes collected by the United States Government for a whole year would scarcely pay the liquor bills of our people for ninety days.

There are about 300,000 people engaged in the liquor business of this country, supplying whisky to about 5,000,000 drinkers, among whom about one-fifth are known as "hard drinkers." During one short year 295,000 people in only 140 cities have been arrested for drunkenness alone! Who, then, will gainsay the statement that the drink evil is the besetting curse of this Republic?

The people of the United States spend every year $1,500,000,000 for intoxicants. We can scarcely realize the magnitude of these figures. All of the gold, silver, copper, and nickel coined by the United States Government from its formation to the present time does not exceed $3,500,000,000; and yet the American people in one year's time spend a third of this amount of money for an article which not only does not help them, but which actually harms them in body and soul. Suppose this billion and a half of money were converted into other industries? It would give back to labor $325,000,000 in additional earnings and wages; it would give employment to 850,000 more laborers.

Mr. Chairman, it has been shown that the liquor traffic returns to labor only 6 cents out of every dollar of product and gives but 28 cents out of each dollar back to the owner of raw material, while manufacturers of shoes, boots, clothing, furniture, hardware, woolen and worsted goods return to labor an average of 23 cents out of every dollar and 50 cents for the owner of raw material.

James B. Dunn has summarized the cost of the liquor traffic to the people of the United States in the following figures:

Amount paid for liquors by consumers		$1,000,000,000
Value of grain, etc., destroyed		33,497,644
Cost of crime, insanity, pauperism, etc., chargeable to liquor traffic		137,762,220
Loss of productive labor		1,106,250,000
Shortened lives		147,000,000
Misdirected work		354,000,000
Total		2,678,504,864
Revenue from liquor traffic:
Internal revenue	$107,695,910
Customs	9,518,081
State and local revenue	24,786,496
		142,000,487
Net loss		2,536,504,377

There are in the United States about 200,000 saloons, costing the entire people the enormous sum of $2,500,000,000; in other words, each saloon costs the people of the community in which it exists an average of $12,000 every year. This is a frightful drain upon the honest industries of our country.

About 75 per cent of the paupers of the country are said to be addicted to the use of liquor. One or both of the parents of about one-half the paupers of the country were intemperate. About 40 per cent of the paupers of the country openly attribute their pauperism to their own intemperate habits.

The whisky traffic is a fruitful source of crime. In nearly 80 cases out of every 100 crime has been committed when the defendant was under the influence of intoxicants. Is it any wonder, therefore, that prohibition sentiment is growing stronger every day?

But some one will say, "I am opposed to prohibition because it does not prohibit." Such a person might as well say that he is opposed to the law against homicides and theft, because these laws do not prohibit such offenses.

Furthermore, the argument that prohibition does not prohibit is not a sound one, as is shown by the experience of those States that have adopted prohibition. Listen to the testimony from Maine. This State adopted prohibition in 1855, and at that time, to use the language of Gen. Neal Dow, she was "one of the most drunken and poorest States in the Union, there being seven distilleries and two breweries in Portland alone." At that time there were only five savings banks throughout the State of Maine, with only $90,000,000 deposits. To-day there are more than sixty of such banks, thirty building and loan associations, forty trust companies, aggregating deposits of more than $120,000,000. She has a greater proportion of school teachers to every 10,000 of her population and a greater proportion of teachers to her school population than any of the forty-five sister States of the Union. Sentences to jail have decreased in the last fifteen years 30 per cent and sentences for drunkenness have decreased 40 per cent in the same length of time. Governors of Maine for the last fifty years have testified to the success of prohibition there. James G. Blaine, Fessenden, Dingley, and Mr. LITTLEFIELD, the present able Representative in Congress from Maine, all testify to the success of prohibition in that State.

Governor Burke, of North Dakota, last year said:

We have had prohibition so long in North Dakota that in some counties there are no jails. There is not much cirme in the State.

Out of 105 counties in the State of Kansas, 21 of them have no paupers and only 25 counties have poorhouses, and in 55 counties there are no prisoners in the jails. In 37 counties there are no criminal cases on the dockets. There is no other State in the Union that has such a small number of paupers in proportion to its population or spends as much money for education in proportion to its population.

The State of Georgia put in operation her State prohibition law on the 1st of last January, and in two months crime had been reduced more than 50 per cent. Atlanta, Ga., is a great and busy city, with more than 100,000 population; and on January 4, 1907, while barrooms existed, there were sixty-three cases reported in the police court, while on January 4, 1908, under prohibition, there were only seventeen cases reported. On January 4, 1907, while barrooms flourished, thirty-two cases of drunkenness were reported to the police courts, while on January 4, 1908, under prohibition, not a single case was reported. The Atlanta Constitution recently said:

It was a transformed Decatur street which Atlantans saw yesterday afternoon and last night. The exchange was not so apparent in the matter of the number of people who were on the streets, but was found in the fact that it was a sober people, intent on business and legitimate amusement, who walked up and down this busy thoroughfare. Not a single person, white or negro, was seen under the influence of intoxicants.

A few months ago the people voted the saloons out of Wadesboro, N. C., and here is the testimony of one of the leading papers of that city:

Since saloons closed business in Wadesboro the police force has been reduced from five to three men, and no citizen here but will say that order here is better than before. If the commissioners find that three men can do the work it required five to do before, they will save the town more than $1,000 during the year.

On the 23d of January, 1908, the National American, a widely circulated newspaper published in Nashville, Tenn., contained a cartoon of a criminal dressed in prison clothes. On him was the inscription "The annual cost of crime to taxpayers of the country is $100,000,000." The convict is represented as making this pungent remark to the taxpayers:

This suit of clothes cost you a pretty penny. Some day you may get it through your head that it is cheaper to prevent crime than to punish it.

As whisky and the whisky traffic are responsible for about 80 per cent of the crime of our State, is it not plain that the best way to prevent crime is to abolish the whisky traffic?

So, Mr. Chairman, from high testimonials we can easily gather that prohibition is a blessing and a benefit morally and industrially to those States that have adopted it. Then, why should not the voters and citizens who love peace, revere the law, hate crime, and weep over sorrow, unite in one grand phalanx and on May 26 drive the saloon forever from the borders of our beloved and fair Carolina?

I know of no better way to close this imperfect address than by quoting from that lovely, loving, and beloved great Georgian, Henry W. Grady, whose untimely death prevented him from seeing his dream realized in prohibition for his Commonwealth, who, in discussing the whisky traffic, said:

To-night it enters an humble home to strike the roses from a woman's cheek, and to-morrow it challenges this Republic in the halls of Congress.

To-day it strikes a crust from the lips of a starving child and to-morrow levies tribute from the Government itself.

There is no cottage humble enough to escape it, no palace strong enough to shut it out.

It defies the law when it can not coerce suffrage.

It is flexible to cajole, but merciless in victory.

It is the mortal enemy of peace and order, the despoiler of men, and the terror of women, the cloud that shadows the face of children, the demon that has dug more graves and sent more souls unshrived to judgment than all the pestilences that have wasted life since God sent the plagues to Egypt and all the wails since Joshua stood beyond Jericho.

It comes to ruin, and it shall profit mainly by the ruin of your sons and mine.

It comes to mislead human souls and to crush human hearts under its rumbling wheels.

It comes to bring gray-haired mothers down in shame and sorrow to their graves.

It comes to change the wife's love into despair and her pride into shame.

It comes to still the laughter on the lips of little children.

It comes to stifle all the music of the home and fill it with silence and desolation.

It comes to ruin your body and mind, to wreck your home, and it knows it must measure its prosperity by the swiftness and certainty with which it wrecks the world.

[Loud applause.]

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I now yield fifty minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to discuss the question of battle ships. With some of us this is a question of money. With others it is a question of business. With me it is a question of principle and conscience, but with no one can it possibly be a question of partisan politics. Consequently every man on either side of this Chamber will be free to exercise his own conscientious judgment and vote his own personal convictions.

At the outset I desire to call the attention of the House and the country to the fact that the naval programme provided for in this bill is in contravention of the policy which had heretofore been agreed upon as the American naval policy for the present and future. It had been wisely proposed and after much discussion practically decided that beyond the replacing, one by one, of the old hulls by new battle ships, a further increase of the Navy was not necessary. This wise and rational policy had my hearty support, the more so because I had taken a special interest in the movement for international arbitration and peace. Neither I nor any other American friend of that great cause, which contemplates the substitution of judicial decisions for brutal war, would have it said that we were unwilling to grant to our country such means of national defense as might become necessary in an emergency, however remote. I recognized the fact then, as I do now, that war can not be abolished by resolutions, and that as long as arbitration treaties do not extend to all causes of international discord, it is the patriotic duty of every nation to prepare for possible emergencies. And it was for still another reason that I supported that policy. It was to demonstrate that the advocates of peace are not impracticable theorists and dreamers who are ready to swap the safety of their country for a hobby, but men of affairs willing to "render unto Cæsar what is Cæsar's" in return for a cooperation of the governments toward a realization of their own humane and progressive ideas.

Since that time, Mr. Chairman, nothing has occurred which would justify us in departing from the policy we then adopted; hence, for one, I shall be obliged to adhere to it now, and in voting for one battle ship I believe to be as patriotic and as generous toward Cæsar as those who are willing to vote for more. [Applause.] It is not only true that nothing has occurred in the last two years to warrant an increase of naval armaments, but, on the contrary, we also know that a great deal has occurred since we last voted on battle ships which would justify all well-meaning governments in at least calling a halt in naval construction.

It may not be popular at a time when military and naval budgets are being considered to call attention to the great achievements of the Second Peace Conference at The Hague, but, for my part, I could not imagine a more appropriate time to do so; in fact, I hold it to be our solemn duty, before voting away the people's money, to carefully consider actual necessities, especially at a time when the revenues, both internal and customs, are falling off and every dollar we can spare is badly needed for the erection of buildings to house the growing Federal service and for the improvement of the waterways of the country. [Applause.] And, Mr. Chairman, the actual necessities for military and naval armaments have certainly been lessened by The Hague agreements.

It is true that no understanding was reached with regard to a reduction of armaments, but results have been achieved which, to my mind, are of infinitely greater importance. Armaments are, after all, only the symptom, while the men who were assembled at Holland's capital in the name of international peace applied the knife to the cause of their existence by agreements which are bound to hasten the advent of an era in which large armaments will be as unnecessary for the settlement of controversies between countries as they are between States of the Union to-day.

Let me briefly recapitulate what has been done at The Hague. A very much condensed report which I had the honor to submit to a recent meeting of the Arbitration Group in Congress, the American Branch of the Interparliamentary Union, contains this language:

The Second Hague Conference has now passed into history, but its achievements and results are comparatively little known, because of the fact that a large part of the press did not pay the attention to the conference which it deserved.

One far-reaching decision arrived at was that the conference should meet again. This practically assures the permanency of these great international congresses at which the foundation for more enduring peace between the nations is to be laid by a peaceful discussion of the questions which are of common concern to all. Furthermore, the conference practically agreed on the principle of obligatory arbitration, but instead of adopting a general treaty which would be binding for all and would specify the questions which must be settled by judicial decisions the powers agreed to leave the conclusion of such treaties to the separate nations, and it is to be noted with great satisfaction that President Roosevelt has already taken the initiative under these new Hague agreements by proposing arbitration treaties with France, Great Britain, Germany, Portugal, Italy, and other countries. For one, I should like to see Japan included in that list, and I am sure that such a proposition would be hailed with delight by that great oriental nation. The conference also agreed to the establishment of a Hague court on a more substantial basis by providing permanent judges for that great world tribunal. As I say, in principle this plan was sanctioned, but the appointment of the judges caused considerable dissension, which merely goes to show that when it comes to a question of patronage the greatest statesmen of the world can display just as much spirit as the ordinary politicians would over the division of the spoils. A tentative agreement, however, was reached and no doubt the powers will, by diplomatic negotiations, settle the question of these judgeships in the near future.

These are the questions relating to arbitration and to the peaceful settlement of international differences, but a great deal has also been accomplished in other directions, especially in well-meant efforts to make future war more humane. It would take up too much of your time to specify the many conventions concluded at The Hague, and as a great step forward I will mention only the one which provides that no unfortified cities, towns, and villages shall ever be bombarded by an enemy, which, in my humble judgment, makes the fortification of coast lines almost unnecessary. It means that by fortifying they would only invite the fire of the enemy, while they would be perfectly safe and immune if they remained unfortified.

Very few have an adequate idea of the intricacies of the questions which were discussed at The Hague, and while some people wonder why the conference should last so long, it is the greater wonder that it accomplished so much in so little time. There were forty-six nations represented, each with its peculiar interests and claims, and, in my judgment, it is due only to the growing sentiment of the people in favor of arbitration and peace which made agreement possible at all.

Lest I may be accused of undue optimism in thus relating how great an advance has been made in the direction of a state of international peace and order to be based on law and justice, instead of arbitrary force, permit me to supplement this report by cold facts. The Hague Conference approved not less than thirteen so-called conventions, namely, the following:

1. The peaceful regulation of international conflicts.
2. Providing for an international prize court.
3. Regulating the rights and duties of neutrals on land.
4. Regulating the rights and duties of neutrals at sea.
5. Covering the laying of submarine mines.
6. Prohibiting the bombardment of undefended ports, towns, villages, and buildings from the sea.
7. Forbidding the employment of force in the collection of contractual debts until after arbitration has been refused or an arbitral reward set at naught.
8. The transformation of merchantmen into war ships.
9. The treatment of captured crews.
10. The inviolability of fishing boats.
11. The inviolability of the postal service.
12. The application of the Geneva Convention and the Red Cross to sea warfare; and
13. The laws and customs regulating land warfare.

The approval of each of these thirteen conventions required unanimity of all of the forty-six governments represented. But for this requirement three more agreements would have been added to this record of international honor, namely, those providing for obligatory arbitration in specified cases, a supreme court of the world with seventeen permanent judges, and immunity of private property at sea in time of war. As to each one of these most important propositions there were but a few dissenting votes; hence from now on, let me say parenthetically, it will be the mission of all "pacifists" the world over to convert the dissenters. It is plain that this can be accomplished, not by an increase of armaments, but only by educational methods.

A contemporaneous writer has this to say on the Second Hague Conference:

Here was the parliament of man, about which we have been dreaming and singing for generations, actually realized under our eyes in plain prose in the year 1907. For the first real parliament of man it was, a congress in which the official representatives of practically all the nations of the world were gathered to confer and act upon the things which concern the interests of all nations alike. We have heard it called a failure and even a fiasco. It was neither. Its achievements were very great, even if they were not all which the peace workers of the world hoped for; and the meeting of the conference itself, with its earnest deliberations for four months, was something of high significance quite aside from any particular measures which it agreed upon. If we would estimate definitely how far its actual achievements meet the demands of the world's peace party, we must measure them by those demands as formulated by the Interparliamentary Union at its convention in London in 1906, for those London resolutions constitute the working platform of the world's peace party to-day—the platform for which all will steadily work until it is entirely written into international law.

The six demands of the Interparliamentary Union, which consists of 2,500 members of the different national parliaments of the world, men who are devoted all of them to the cause of peace and arbitration, were for (1) a regular international parliament; (2) a general obligatory arbitration treaty; (3) the proportional limitation of national armaments; (4) the inviolability of ocean commerce in war; (5) impartial commissions to investigate and report to the world upon all differences between two nations which can not be settled by diplomacy or arbitration before any declaration of war; and (6) national peace budgets—regular appropriations by the different governments to promote international friendship and good understanding.

The arrangement for the meeting of a Third Hague Conference practically assures a regular international parliament hereafter; and this assurance of a regular international parliament is one great outcome of the Second Hague Conference, as the international tribunal was the memorable outcome of the first conference. A general arbitration treaty was not accepted by all the powers represented at The Hague, such unanimity being necessary for action; but it was voted by an enormous majority, and independent treaties between the different nations are sure now to multiply rapidly until all nations are included. Secretary Root is at this moment negotiating treaties between ourselves and several nations. A great majority of the nations voted in favor of the immunity from capture of all private property at sea in time of war, showing that this is the judgment of the enlightened world to-day. Definite action to this end was blocked by Great Britain, as discussion of the limitation of armaments was blocked by Germany.

While The Hague Conference should be treated with justice, the fact that there is in large circles in the most progressive nations such general expression of discontent with the outcome of its work is a witness to the large demand which thoughtful people everywhere are now making in the matters which concern the peace and better order of the world. This is most hopeful; and these demands will steadily grow larger and more emphatic until the barbarous old war system of the nations is supplanted by rational methods worthy of to-day's civilization, and quarrels between nations are settled in the courts as a matter of course, as they are now settled between individuals. We Americans, who know the history of our constitutional convention of 1787 and how difficult it was to organize these thirteen States into one Union, will not fail to be properly patient while the vastly greater work of organizing half a hundred nations, with their varying systems of law, prepossessions, and prejudices, goes on. Let us also not fail to do our part in the creation of such an energetic and influential public opinion as shall make the United States a leading and potent factor in the organization of the united world.

Without special reference to the great propositions tending to prevent future war, Gen. Horace Porter, one of the leading American delegates to The Hague, has summarized those results of the conference which are intended to regulate future war in the following language:

The conference has affirmed in many directions the rights of neutrals against those of belligerents. It has placed restrictions upon the use of floating mines, which have been a menace to the commerce of the world, without impairing the right of nations at war to use anchored mines for self-defense. It has peremptorily forbidden the bombarding of undefended seacoast towns and villages. It has prohibited the levying of contributions by threat of bombarding. It has done much to strengthen security against the atrocities which often occur in war. It has shielded the noncombatant. It has strengthened the provisions for the relief of the wounded. It has taken strict precautions against a revival of privateering in naval war by insisting that when merchant vessels are converted into cruisers they shall be formally enrolled on the naval list and placed in command of a duly commissioned naval officer, with a crew subject to naval discipline. Such questions as contraband of war and blockade, though no agreement was reached, and on every important question which came before us we have made a great and truly marvelous advance toward an agreement on more civilized lines. So great indeed has been the growth of international sentiment that it is probable that at the conference of the leading naval powers which England intends to summon in 1908 we shall find ourselves able to settle some questions which have been a source of difference for a hundred years. It was America that proposed the Permanent Court of Arbitral Justice—not a mere court of arbitration, but a judicial court composed of the ablest jurists of all nations, representing all systems of law and all languages.

In view of this testimony who will dare to deny that the results of The Hague Conference, besides mitigating the atrocities of future wars, will also tend—and this concerns us now—to materially lessen the possibilities of war? While causes of friction may continue to exist, their removal by peaceful means and without bloodshed has been made possible by the acceptance, at least in principle, of the judicial mode of settling such differences. Well-meaning governments will readily avail themselves of this weapon—if I may use the word—to save human life, a weapon forged in the heat of that civilization which impels our warfare upon war. It is fully realized by the cabinets of the world that what was accomplished at The Hague was inspired by, and a concession to, the overwhelming sentiment of the civilized nations; hence it is this sublime sentiment, and not the war spirit of the middle ages, which should be the guiding star of modern governments. If European rulers are willing to repudiate the concession they have just made at The Hague to the high moral thought of the twentieth century; if, by increasing their armaments in the wake of the Peace Congress, they wish to commit an act of infidelity and bad faith against themselves, we can not stop them; but let us hope that no American Government may ever be a party to such duplicity. [Applause.]

It was in response to an invitation issued by the United States that the Second Hague Conference met. An American representative wrote the resolution which the Interparliamentary Union adopted on American soil, and upon which President Roosevelt acted by issuing that invitation. The main planks in the platform of the Interparliamentary Union are of American origin, and these same propositions were the principal topics of discussion at The Hague. The project, too, of a permanent court of arbitral justice was substantially an American proposal, as was the agreement to eliminate force in the collection of contractual debts. The official American delegates—and as an observer I was proud of them—occupied the center of The Hague stage, and their influence was practically unlimited because everybody believes in the sublime sincerity of America's peace mission. [Applause.]

As a result, General Porter was justified in saying that—

The great achievement of the conference has been to push forward in every department of international life American principles.

In playing that rôle before the eyes of the world we, on our part, are simply true to American traditions. We are merely obeying the lessons taught us by every President from Washington to Roosevelt. But we have thus created an impression abroad which every instinct of honor impels us to live up to at home. That impression is that our experiment for self-government is a success, inasmuch as it makes for peace and is a sure guaranty of permanent relief from excessive military burdens. As a result, the people of all the world look to the United States for salvation. They have seen us take the lead in a movement for a new dispensation and are taking us at our word. Consequently our prestige depends upon our consistency. The very moment we begin aping the Old World in its mad rivalry for military power and splendor we shall descend to the level of the old monarchies. [Applause.] The difference between popular self-government based on democratic virtues, on the one hand, and monarchical government resting on military power and prowess on the other, will be wiped out. The light of hope which our example had lit in the human hearts everywhere will be extinguished, and we ourselves shall stand convicted of treachery to the most cherished American traditions. [Applause.]

Viewed from this standpoint the question of expense, it is true, becomes a minor issue, and for one I would rather vote for ten times the cost of a dozen new battle ships if I could thereby prevent their construction and thus aid not only in maintaining American prestige the world over, but also in demonstrating the sincerity of our professions, and last, not least, the superiority of republican over monarchical institutions. [Applause.]

Let us take a look around. Germany has recently enlarged her naval budget, but whatever reasons she may have had for her action, they surely do not concern us. Great Britain, though she has twice proposed an arrest of armaments by international agreement, is obliged to follow suit—in fact, William T. Stead insists that England's answer should be two new ships to each one Germany is building. Some do not seem to see it that way, but Stead's purpose is, of course, to demonstrate the absurdity of this continued rivalry, and it is to be hoped that his object lesson may eventually be understood. But whatever the British Government may do, its eyes are certainly on the Continent of Europe and not on us. We have little to fear from any European power, and even less from Japan, all jingo talk to the contrary notwithstanding. [Applause.]

Unless we are all in ignorance as to the true situation—and it is incredible that the Mikado's diplomatic representatives should misrepresent it to us—a simple agreement to arbitrate differences and to mutually guarantee territorial integrity and undisputed home sovereignty would effectually dispose of the Japanese question for all time to come, and not a single battle ship will be needed to secure the benefits of such a treaty.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I am very sorry, but my time is so limited that I can not yield. There is, then, no cloud in our diplomatic sky, and never before in our history were our relations with the greater powers more friendly than they are to-day. If this were not true, we, as the people's representatives, would certainly know it, for we are happy to have an Administration which from the first has taken the people into its confidence. There is neither political nor commercial necessity for trouble of any kind, and, what is more, the American people have the confidence in President Roosevelt and his great Secretary of States to know, first, that no aggressive war would ever be waged by them; secondly, that our affairs with all the world are being administered on the basis of fair dealing and with even-handed justice to all; and thirdly, that even in case of a controversy with any country, big or small, they would be eager to again furnish an object lesson to the world, as the present Administration has done before, by taking advantage of The Hague judicial machinery for its arbitrament.

Under the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I believe every Member of the House to be justified, from the standpoint of international obligations as well as that of national security and national honor, in declining to go beyond the naval programme as agreed upon at the two sessions of the last Congress, and which means one new battle ship each year to replace an old one. And I repeat that this is most generous, because since then the possibilities of war have been greatly lessened and the prospects of more lasting peace correspondingly brightened.

We hear so much of late of an adequate navy. Can anyone tell me what that is? Certainly there is no measure by which to gauge it, and there is no principle, scientific or other, governing any change above or below present proportions, except the time-honored American tradition that the United States will neither engage in a war of conquest nor ever take the offensive for any purpose except for national defense. The only rule to guide us, then, is the right of self-protection, and I claim the American Navy in its present strength is adequate to vouchsafe our national security, for in our estimates we must not overlook those battle ships which have just been completed, namely, the Mississippi, the Ohio, and the New Hampshire, and the armored cruisers North Carolina and Montana, or those which have been authorized and are now in course of construction, namely, the South Carolina, Michigan, Delaware, and South Dakota, all of the latter four being 20,000-ton ships. This makes an addition to our present strength of seven big battle ships and two armored cruisers. It may be argued that since other nations are keeping on building new battle ships we must follow suit in order to maintain a proportionate measure of protection; but, if true, was not this just as true a year and two years ago when we announced we would go no further? In this connection let me ask you, gentlemen, What has protected us and vouchsafed our security since 1812—that is, during the last hundred years? It certainly was not the Navy, because up to the eighties, with the exception of the civil-war period, we practically had none.

If any European nation ever had any designs on us, the time for it to come on would certainly have been during the last few weeks while our battle ships are bottled up in the Pacific Ocean and can not reach the Atlantic in less than two months. For three months our whole eastern coast has been completely exposed to attacks by European navies, but if there was a whisper or a suggestion of such a thing on the part of any power I have not heard of it. Oh, but you say, we now have the Philippines to protect, an obligation which did not exist up to a few years ago. Let me remind you that this obligation did exist when we last agreed on our naval programme, with the advice and consent of President Roosevelt, who said in April, 1906:

> We are no longer enlarging our Navy. We are simply keeping up its strength.

Surely no danger threatens the country to-day that was not known then. America's experience in and with the Philippines has been carefully watched and studied in the cabinets of the world, and from the expressions I have heard on my European trips I am led to believe that not one of the great powers would accept the islands even as a present. In holding them, as we were in honor bound to do, we have made the greatest sacrifices of blood and treasure. [Applause.] But if, on account of them, Uncle Sam is to become one of the war lords; if, for fear of losing them, we are expected to take part in the mad rivalry in naval construction, and if we are to go back on our Hague pledges, I assert frankly that this would entail a sacrifice too great to make, because it involves one of high principle. And, gentlemen, do not let us forget that fully as much as may have been added to our cares by the acquisition of the Philippines has been taken from us in another section of the world. The adoption of the Drago doctrine by The Hague Conference, putting an end to all forcible collection of debts from one nation by another and removing at a stroke most of our real or fancied responsibility for the South American republics, surely cuts off an immense fraction of our own naval needs.

One argument remains to be answered. It is the seductive plea that we should make it our mission to enforce the peace of the world by sheer naval strength. In other words, the United States should declare peace to be the rule of the world and put down war, the exception wherever and whenever it occurs. "Difficile est satiram non scribere!" Our good Uncle Sam is to be a sort of international bully, the universal policeman charged with the duty of enforcing the peace of the world with a big stick bigger than all other big sticks on earth. [Laughter and applause.] But the prophets of "the peace-promoting power of a great navy" appear really to be in earnest. Evidently it has not occurred to them that a navy so powerful as to meet their ideas of adequacy might become a menace not only to the world's peace which they hope to enforce, but also to our own liberties. Besides, it will be difficult to convince the ordinary intellect that two pistols in a man's pocket will better vouchsafe the peace of his neighbors—or his own, for that matter—than one pistol or no pistol at all. And from their view point what would be an adequate navy? If the size of our armaments is to be the only measure of our peace and safety, we would have to have a navy certainly larger than the most powerful now in existence, namely, that of Great Britain, and, in fact, larger than that of all the great powers combined. Otherwise we would be in constant danger of being overawed, because a combination of powers against us is not altogether impossible. I ask you in all seriousness, Is this not the true logic of the plea for a bigger navy if, as its prophets say, the peace and security of the United States depended on it alone?

But do these prophets draw this logical conclusion. Oh, no; their own reasoning evidently seized them with dizziness, for instead of asking for a hundred or a hundred and fifty new Dreadnoughts, as they should do, they content themselves with a demand for two, or four, or six, or whatever they can get. But prompted by the reasoning of the Navy boomers, let me ask the foolish question, What is to become of us in the meantime? Even if their most extravagant demands were granted by Congress, and granted annually, it would surely take a quarter of a century before we could cope with England and the united European powers in naval strength. Where would be our security in all these years to come? Would our friends petition Europe to kindly wait until we are ready? Or will they stand idly by while 80,000,000 people shudder and tremble in agonizing terror for twenty-five long years? Certain it is that the same danger which is now threatening us in the imagination of our friends has existed for a hundred years. How fortunate we did not know it!

In civilized society an individual is secure, not because he carries weapons, but because he is honest, law-abiding, righteous, and peaceful. The same is true of a nation, especially since arbitrary power is more and more being curtailed by international obligations. Our own national security from foreign foes has never depended on our immediate military prowess, but was and is the result of righteousness, love of peace, and other civic virtues as much as of our limitless resources, reserved strength, and geographical isolation. This has become an American axiom, and if it was true at a time when might was right without equivocation, how much more must it be true when the nations of the earth, in solemn conclave, have resolved to dethrone arbitrary power and force, and, instead, worship at the shrine of international justice! [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, contrary to common report, I am by no means a sentimentalist on this question. My course was as practical as the demands of patriotism and the necessities of my country dictated, and I repeat what I said in the beginning, that as in the past I am ready now to support President Roosevelt's policy announced a year ago, namely one battle ship annually, which, to use his own language, means no enlargement of the Navy, but merely "enables us to keep up our strength and make good the units which become obsolete." On this platform I propose to stand, and I shall go no further, believing as I do that even the battle ships we now have will never be needed except for show.

Mr. Chairman, in a remonstrance against further naval increases, which was recently sent to Congress by several hundred of the leading clergymen of the city of New York and by 150 ministers of Boston, I find the following language:

> Sixty-five per cent of the national income is now expended on war, past and present. The increase of our naval budget has recently been used in the French Assembly as a reason for increasing its own; is largely responsible for the increase of armaments among Asiatic nations, and is well-nigh certain to retard the reduction in the armaments of the world, for which we have so long been waiting. The growing discontent throughout the world at the appalling increase of waste of national resources must be heeded. We feel that this protest is the more necessary inasmuch as there are various new and effective methods now available for promoting international friendship and rationally settling difficulties which these demands seem to ignore.

This is the whole case in a nutshell. But do we realize the gravity of the indictment which the church hurls against us in these words, namely, that instead of continuing our peace preparations in deference to American professions at The Hague we are going back on our word and, by our bad example, are stimulating other nations to feverish preparations for war? Is this the mission of a Republic as the fathers have understood that mission? Is it in accord with that American policy, already referred to, which the founders of the Republic have laid down and which, by the baptism of experience, has become a national maxim? No, gentleman, every American impulse drives us in the opposite direction. We thoughtlessly reiterate the phrase that we are building battle ships to preserve the peace. It is the merest cant. Why not be honest? Why not say, "We want them to lick the other fellow in case of trouble?"

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman from Tennessee give me three minutes more?

Mr. PADGETT. I would be glad to, but my time is more than promised.

Mr. HOBSON. With the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee in charge of the time, I will yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I thank the gentleman from Alabama.

If we honestly want peace, Mr. Chairman, we should prepare for peace. And of all the nations on earth, we Americans should be the last to accept a peace which is offered only on the points of bayonets, because that peace is the kind despots graciously offered their subjects at all times, even in the darkest periods of the world's history. To secure it we need no arbitration treaties and peace conferences. But in this enlightened age the people are entitled to a peace based on right and not on might. A new era has dawned upon the human family since in 1899 the nations first came together to proclaim law as a substitute for war. The question is, Shall we go forward or backward? One government must take it upon itself to call a halt in armaments, not by paper resolutions, but by actual example, and there is no country on earth which is in so fortunate a position to do it as is the United States. We have no enemy. We are isolated. Our Navy is big enough for our protection. We have no axes to grind and none except peaceful conquests to make.

No suspicion of weakness could attach to our good example, because all the world knows that we are richer in actual wealth and resources than any other nation. And now is the time, because the development of international law, the better organization of nations in mutual respect, and the multiplication of treaties of arbitration constitute the dominant note in contemporary history. The war against war is the commanding cause of to-day, as the war against slavery was the commanding cause of the period before us—that is, in the language of Andrew Carnegie:

The great duty of our generation is to put a stop to man killing, as the great work of Lincoln's generation was to put a stop to man selling.

May the United States lead in this sacred cause! There is more glory in it in one day than on a hundred battlefields in a thousand years. [Prolonged applause on both sides of the Chamber.]

[Mr. SIMS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LAMAR].

Mr. LAMAR of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, while we are in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union I desire to submit a few remarks which I trust may not be inappropriate.

Thousands of years ago the command was given to Moses and written upon tables of stone, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." Almost every State in this Union, if not all, have on their statute books legislation in some form or another prohibiting the violation of the Sabbath day, but it seems that the men who have molded and shaped the legislation of the nation have neglected to enact such a law for the District of Columbia.

Some weeks ago, while looking over the Monday morning's paper, I found that on the day previous a minister in this city had delivered a sermon on Sabbath observance, and had therein made a statement that there is no law in the District of Columbia prohibiting work on Sunday or forbidding the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise on the Sabbath. I was very much surprised and thought that, undoubtedly, the author of the remark must be mistaken. On reaching the Capitol I went to the library and examined the District Code, and could find no law on the subject.

In order to be sure, however, I called up the office of Major Sylvester and inquired about it and received a reply that the minister was correct, and that there was and is no law in the District of Columbia requiring the observance of the Sabbath day. I immediately framed and introduced a bill modeled largely after the statutes of my own State, prohibiting work (except work of necessity and charity) and prohibiting the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise in the District of Columbia on Sunday. That bill is now pending before the Committee on the District of Columbia, and I desire to discuss it to some extent, or, rather, to discuss the reasons why the Sabbath is not reverenced as it once was, and some of the conditions of the present age which are, in my judgment, responsible for the present tendencies to Sabbath desecration.

"But how the subject theme may gang
Let Time and Chance determine;
Perhaps it may turn out a song;
Perhaps it may turn out a sermon."

I would not abandon the improvements and advantages of the age, but in the wake of the good some evils are following; together with the virtues are linked some vices. I confess that all this riotous, confusing, bewildering bustle and energy of the age which our materialistic progress and rapid advance have brought in their wake indicate to me tendencies which I do not believe promote true progress or elevate humanity.

"'Tis not in titles nor in rank,
'Tis not in wealth like London Bank,
Can make us truly blest;
If Happiness ha'e not her seat and center in the breast,
We may be wise or rich or great, but never can be blest."

This seems to be an age of materialism; an age when the notion that happiness must come from without and not from within appears to have seized upon us all; an age when the practical seems to have smothered and strangled the ideal and when the doctrine seems to have gained full acceptance that happiness can only be attained through the acquirement of our most selfish ambitions. With one, perhaps, it is social preferment, with another political honors, and with others professional reputation, and with the great mass the acquirement of wealth; and, forgetting all else, forgetting and neglecting the development of the better elements of humanity, and each goes through the days and weeks and years, chasing this chimera, this phantom of a delusive hope, until the grave claims him, forgetting that—

"The boast of heraldry, the pomp of pow'r,
And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
Await alike the inevitable hour.
The paths of glory lead but to the grave."

With the evolution of our modern civilization many of the conditions and circumstances which made possible that high development of mental and physical vigor which has characterized American manhood is vanishing, and men are rapidly losing much of that brawny physical development and that spirit of self-reliance which enabled our fathers to carve States out of a virgin wilderness, and to lay the foundations of our present national greatness. Man's life to-day in the busy whirl of the city and in the congested centers of our population is along the line of specifics; to eat and drink and sleep and work, and almost think by some street car time-table; in all of the varied branches of industry large establishments are reaching out and swallowing up the smaller, and the work is apportioned and subdivided, so that it makes a machine of a man.

I am told that more than 200 different men contribute to the work of finishing a single shoe; each has his own particular employment; learns nothing else; knows nothing else, but to toil at a single bench so many hours each day from day to day and year to year. To turn a single crank or do a single piece of work reduces the man to an automaton, destroys his self-reliance and independence, makes of him a machine that unfits him for everything else, saps his vitality, and places the hundreds of thousands of laboring men at the mercy of their employers, and destroys the sturdy spirit of self-reliance which a century ago impelled men to go forth into a wilderness and subdue a continent and lay the foundations for our future civilization. [Applause.]

This tendency not only reaches the day laborer, but embraces within its influences all the varied business interests and the professions. This is an age of specialties and specifics. The broadax is being displaced by the keener and more polished razor blade. In the legal profession, in the cities, much of the work is done by large firms, which employ their men at a salary, each man having his own specific work in the profession and paying no attention to any other; and the young men now graduating from our law schools, in many cases, instead of launching out upon an independent career and relying upon their own strength and resources, are becoming clerks at a salary in the offices of these firms, and enter upon the ceaseless grind of the same routine day after day, until a wrecked constitution and a sapped manhood tell the result at thirty-five or forty.

Day after day they rise, glance over the headlines of a metropolitan paper while at breakfast; pass over the same street car lines, enter the same office at the same time, see the same walls, discuss business at lunch, go home at the same hour every evening, follow a ceaseless routine which robs life of its zest, and takes away its ambitions and aspirations and renders impossible that growth and development which makes an all-round man; and this is the life experience of thousands of busy business men. They have no time for the cultivation of their higher nature; no time to educate the ethical and moral side of their being; and by 35 or 40 they are dyspeptics, their hopes and their ambitions starved and their manhood dwarfed by the conditions attending the spirit of the age.

And this moving, seething, restless, consuming rush to reach the front of the procession and keep in touch with the spirit of the times and maintain their place against the fierce competition of the age; pervades all the industrial and social world, all the avenues of life, and even reaches into childhood with its blighting influences. Children are born amid such surroundings and into this atmosphere. Boys, as soon as they are large enough to wear knee pants and speak distinctly, are put in positions as bell boys, messenger boys, elevator boys, etc., and join the mad rush and whirl and become prematurely old, instead of spending the days of innocent childhood in the development of brain and muscle, inhaling and absorbing strength of mind and body, and developing those powers and faculties which will give them that vigor and strength so necessary for a useful and happy manhood. I am really sorry for the boy that has never known the experience of running through a brier patch barefooted, of having colic from eating green apples, or has never had a stone bruise on his heel. [Laughter and applause.]

It was in savage time that woman was a slave and served her master in menial tasks. We are fast on the road to a new savagery. The journey began when the discovery of machinery and the factory system took the place of the man and the tool. Greedy employers bade the delicate fingers of womanhood and the dimpled hand of childhood grasp the fallen task, and haggard faces and puny frames are to be seen as the result in our manufacturing cities. But economic conditions know no chivalry.

The census of 1900 shows there were at that time five and one-quarter millions of female breadwinners in the United States, and a majority of them were under the ages of 25 years. There were at that time nearly 500,000 girls between 10 and 15 years of age earning their own living. The great fact of the last decade is the enormous increase of working girls under the age of 18 years. The number of breadwinners among the women in the continent in the United States increased from 2,353,000 in 1880 to 4,833,000 in 1900, an increase of more than 105 per cent.

Twenty per cent, or one-fifth of the women in the country over the age of 16 years, in 1900 were earning their own living. The tendency is toward the labor of women and children because it is cheaper. In 1900 more than 1,000,000 women were engaged in earning their own living who would not have been in such occupations had conditions and tendencies remained the same as they were in 1880.

Women constitute 73 per cent of the teachers and professors in colleges, 83 per cent of the boarding-house keepers, 86 per cent of the launderers, 82 per cent of the servants and waiters, 28 per cent of the clerks and copyists, 31 per cent of the packers and shippers, 76 per cent of the stenographers and typewriters, 81 per cent of the paper box manufacturers, 29 per cent of the telephone operators, 50 per cent of the bookbinders, 62 per cent of the glove manufacturers, 50 per cent of the operatives in textile mills, 42 per cent of the operatives in carpet factories, 48 per cent of the cotton-mill operatives, 72 per cent of the operatives in hosiery and knitting mills, 58 per cent of the silk operatives, 40 per cent of the woolen-mill operatives, 77 per cent of the textile workers, 99 per cent of the dressmakers, 96 per cent of the seamstresses, 77 per cent of the collar and cuff makers, and 69 per cent of the other textile workers.

A large part of the manufacturing of the United States is now done by women. In the meantime we are sapping the strength of the nation by draining the life of its future mothers. We may well be ashamed of the appliances of the age when we remember that they mean the lifeblood and the agony of delicate womanhood, the paralysis of our homes, the stopping and decay of that abounding physical vigor and vitality which has marked us for a century; because America has been hitherto the paradise of woman. Make our women beasts of burden and the doom of our strength is at hand. No army can be more vigorous than the mothers who bore them.

Within the last few years we have had a curious type of woman, a kind of prodigy; "the new woman," who thinks home life and motherhood a disgrace; whose highest ideal seems to be to check and smother and utterly eliminate from her nature all those attributes of tenderness and modesty which have ever been the chief charm of her sex and have always inspired a spirit of reverence and chivalry in manhood. The chief ambition of the new woman seems to be to spend as much time as possible at the club and as little as possible in the home, to clamor for the ballot and the lecture platform, and bestow her affections on a poodle dog. The woman who calls to our minds the thoughts of angels and heaven is not the new woman on the lecture platform, the one marking the ballot, nor the modern club woman, but the one around the hearthstone. The purest altar from which a prayer ever ascended was from a mother's knee, and the holiest, sweetest recollection man ever had were of home, childhood, and mother. If anything on earth, within the range of human possibilities, can move an angel to rejoice and strike the golden harp with a sweeter refrain it is a mother singing lullabies around the cradle of infancy, and making the home what the dear old simple homes of the land were to many of the present generation, a heaven on earth, a paradise of sweet memories for all coming years.

"But forever and forever,
As long as the river flows,
As long as the heart has passions,
As long as life has woes."

Such memories as in after years, when careworn and heartsick, carry us back to the sunny days of childhood, and prompt the plaintive cry of the tried soul—

"Backward, turn backward, O Time in your flight, Make me a child again, just for to-night."

We may for a passing moment admire the tinsel and the glitter of the fashionable belle; but we worship and revere, and would die for, the mother that taught our infant lips to lisp their first prayer. It is an enigma why women aspire to be masculine. All experience and all history teach us that it is the womanly woman that commands the respect and admiration of her own and succeeding generations. It is that type of woman whom the artists have delighted to paint, and whom the poets have been inspired to describe.

Mrs. Browning's "Aurora Leigh," Tennyson's "Dora," "Ami," "Maud," and "The Princess," Owen Meredith's "Lucile," Longfellow's "Evangeline," Whittier's "Maud Muller," and Burns's "Highland Mary" could never have been conceived or written of the "new woman."

If the new woman had been in fashion when Byron lived, instead of writing the lovely lines—

"She walks in beauty like the night,
Of cloudless climes and starry skies," he probably would have written—

She walks in bloomers sorter tight,
The cynosure of staring eyes.

[Applause.]

If Whittier were writing Maud Muller now, instead of saying—

"Maud Muller, on a summer's day
Raked the meadow sweet with hay,"

he probably would write—

Maud Muller, on a summer's day,
Got on her "bike" and sped away,
'Neath her plug hat glowed the wealth
Of manlike beauty and buxom health.

[Applause.]

We are departing from the old landmarks. Not only the old methods and old social customs, but the old literature and the old books are abandoned; and I might say that during this Administration the Constitution of the fathers is unheeded and disregarded. It seems to be an age when we are launching out on a new sea without chart or compass. [Applause.]

The very intellectual atmosphere which surrounds us, and into which our children are born and in which they live and grow to mature years, is surcharged with the spirit of this bewildering restlessness of the twentieth century and perverting the literary tastes of modern society, to satisfy which a sensational press is continually pouring into the homes of the nation literature breathing doctrines and sentiments which half a century ago the fathers and mothers would have banished from their homes as deadly poison. The editions of Trilby and Quo Vadis—the one a biography of a habitué of the Latin Quarter of Paris, and the other depicting scenes of licentiousness and debauchery which would bring a blush of shame to the cheek of a courtesan—run into the hundreds of thousands, set in a flutter the literary folk of two continents; while the old masters who furnished the intellectual food and strength and inspiration of a generation ago are neglected. The presses of the country are continually pouring forth a mass of literature to satisfy the morbid tastes of the present generation. Three Weeks runs into hundreds of thousands, and must be read if one is to discuss literary matters in a fashionable parlor. But does anyone believe his wife, daughter, or sister would be a wiser, purer, or better woman for having read it?

Run over the list of books advertised by the leading publishers of to-day, the editions of some of which run into the hundreds of thousands, and whose sales in the last decade have been at the head of the list, and how barren they are of any thought or sentiment calculated to strengthen the mind or furnish food for the soul. James Lane Allen's Reign of Law is rank infidelity. The Chofer and Life's Shop Window ought to be banished from the mails. A long list of others may engage the fancy for a passing hour, but fail to leave the mind wiser or the heart purer.

Much contained in our popular magazines, those which are supposed to present the cream of the intellectual world, breathes the spirit of iconoclasm destructive of the old landmarks and the faith of our fathers, inculcating notions of materialism and higher criticism and, too often, of absolute infidelity.

How often the old folks at home have toiled and economized and after years of self-denial sent the son in whom their affection centered and whose future held their fondest hopes to the university, that he might have a finished education, and found after a few years in a modern university that, in proportion as he learns football and attends the Greek letter societies he forgets his father's Bible and his mother's faith; that while the things supposed to make him a finished scholar were being crowded into his mind the lessons learned around the hearthstone were smothered out; that with his lessons in science, as taught to him by the modern lecturer, came the conviction that the account of creation is a myth and the Gospel of the Evangelists a superstition. Not only are these sentiments and notions eating like a cancer into the heart of society and the industrial world, but they are even reaching into the domain of the church, invading the sanctuary and laying hold upon the very horns of the altar. [Applause.]

I noticed in one of the metropolitan papers not many months ago that one of the fashionable churches in New York City had adopted a rule that at each Sunday evening service all the worshipers must appear in full evening dress.

At the congress of religions held in Buffalo during the Pan-American Exposition a divine of the city of Chicago said:

I believe in dancing and card playing; I would turn the church vestry, if I had no other place, into a hall for dancing. I'd have billiard and pool tables, and I'd have card playing under the auspices of the church.

And, no doubt, in a short time we will hear from some other exponent of modern religion that a saloon in the basement and a poker table in the attic are valuable adjuncts to a modern church.

Some of the so-called "evangelists," with their sensational methods, would find a more fitting place on the stage of a cheap vaudeville theater than in a pulpit in a house of worship.

I am sincerely glad that in the rural districts less of these tendencies and influences exist than anywhere else. I am glad that there at least the old simplicity and the old-time virtue that gave strength and vigor to our fathers and our mothers are yet honored and are not forgotten; that the old songs and the old religion and the old faith are not yet relegated to the realms of superstition; and if our nation is to endure and our institutions be handed down unimpaired to the coming generations, it is from these sources that our national vigor and our industrial strength must be fed and nourished. It has been and will ever be from these sources that the great, brawny, sturdy, independent individualities who leave their mark upon the nation and upon the history of the world will come, those who will stand as the sentinels upon the watch-towers of human liberty and whose influences will be felt in shaping the destinies of the nation, the men whose lives will mark the milestones in the pathway by which the human race advances to higher planes of life.

The hope of the nation and of society and of religion lies in the vigor and the honor and the purity and the virtue of these great medial classes found largely in the rural population.

From scenes like these old Scotia's grandeur springs,
That makes her loved at home, revered abroad:
Princes and lords are but the breath of kings,
"An honest man's the noblest work of God."

This is largely the condition, thank God, in the district which I have the honor to represent. Down in the beautiful Missouri Ozarks, where "Dad" and "Mam," and John and Bill, and Sis and Ann meet around the family hearthstone, away from the blighting influences of modern social conditions; away from the hypocrisy and snobbery of modern society, worshiping the God of their fathers, revering the Sabbath Day; physically, morally, and intellectually the equals of any people on God's footstool; every woman a queen; every man a king; bubbling over with sturdy, robust manhood, ready to fight and to die for his family, his honor, his religion, and his country; enjoying happiness in this world and assured of happiness in the world to come.

I have read of the wonder of the ancient world, the hanging gardens of Babylon, which Nebuchadnezzar reared in graceful terraces high above the brazen gates of the city, to remind his Median wife of her mountain home, and I have read in the Odyssey of that land of delight, the island of the lotos-eaters, of which Tennyson draws this beautiful picture:

How sweet it were, hearing the downward stream, with half-shut eyes, to ever seem, falling asleep in a half dream.

But certainly the garden spot of the modern world is in the Mississippi Valley, with its sun-kissed mountains and broad rolling prairies. The paradise of the twentieth century civilization, there in our magnificent, fertile, and majestic Missouri, with her blue sky, her pellucid streams, her balmy air, her gorgeous sunsets, and her everlasting hills. We may visit the famed galleries of the world, and feast our æsthetic tastes upon the masterpieces of Raphael, Rembrandt, and Angelo, Reynolds, and Vandyke, but no painter's brush ever has, or ever can, produce on canvas half the glory and majesty and sublimity of an autumn sunset in the Ozark Hills, with the golden sunlight gilding the tree tops and throwing over and about the variegated foliage its soft and mellow radiance. [Applause.]

Beethoven and Mozart, Mendelssohn and Handel and Wagner have poured forth a flood of melody and harmony which will delight the ears of mankind while civilization lasts, but it can never inspire that feeling of buoyancy and exhilaration, that bubbling joy and gladness which is felt by the barefoot boy as he listens to the morning song of the mocking bird, the robin, and the lark as they flit from limb to limb, while the sunlight glistens on the dew, and the very air he breathes is full of life and gladness. [Applause.]

It is inspiring to know that the great apostle of the Democratic party, he whose name is already inscribed in the hearts of his followers and will be inscribed on our banner in the coming campaign, is an example of all these Christian virtues; is an apostle of a pure life and the believer in a clean literature, an advocate of the old-fashioned home; and it is these virtues and graces, added to his being an exponent of the great economic questions for which his party and the common people stand, that has endeared him to a greater number of American citizens than perhaps any other one man in the history of the country; which has made him the nominee of his party twice and given him the largest popular vote ever received by a Presidential candidate in the United States, and which will again make him the nominee of his party, and will elect him the President of his country and land him in the White House in 1909 a Christian President of a Christian nation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TOU VELLE].

Mr. TOU VELLE. Mr. Chairman, one of the characteristics of our civilization is its tendency to honor those who have borne arms in its defense—to build monuments to the men who have gone gallantly to death in their devotion to duty and the higher calls of the soul.

England has planted a triumphal stone on the blood-stained field of Waterloo, while on Trafalgar square, London, an illustrious shaft shoots upward to the sky, an imperishable monument to British heroism, daring, and loyalty. Near Niagara Falls another monument greets the eye, reared to the memory of General Brock and the soldiers who fell at that spot in their contest with American arms. We find them in every civilized country, the monumental signatures of immortality—the tribute of the living to the immortal dead.

Nor have we as Americans been intentionally lax in our tributes of respect to our own immortal dead who were killed in our Revolutionary and other wars. We have built monuments at Saratoga and at Kings Mountain in memory of the brave men who dedicated their lives at these places, the two great turning points in our struggle for liberty. Monuments grace our fair land from one end to the other, attesting the heroism of our soldiers in the war of 1812, the Florida Indian wars, the Mexican war, and the great titanic struggle between the sections in 1861. Monuments at Bennington, Bunker Hill, Savannah, and elsewhere lend inspiration to the living by teaching us how our warriors died. No one can object to any of these, nor to all of them. Certainly to look upon them fills every truly American heart with patriotic pride.

It is a great pleasure for me to ask, not that we build fewer, but that we build more, and the number be made to include a spot which should never become a forgotten page in our history. I have introduced a bill to appropriate $35,000 for the erection of a monument to the illustrious dead who fell fighting on two occasions on the selfsame ground—on the spot which marks the scene of St. Clair's defeat and where afterwards Fort Recovery was erected and so gallantly defended—and in the opinion of every soldier and citizen this body will not only honor the brave men who died on these occasions, but also honor itself by voting for the appropriation I ask.

I come from a region once the home of the Indian to ask the Congress of the United States to build a monument to mark a spot made glorious and deathlessly magnificent by the heroism of the American soldiery in a great struggle which wrested Ohio and Indiana from the control of a savage foe and added their men, their soil, and their influence to the all-conquering power of American civilization. [Applause.]

Lest we forget the heroism of these men and the prize they won for American arms and glory, I beg to be excused for describing these almost forgotten battles, St. Clair's defeat and Wayne's victory, and for enumerating some of the almost forgotten dead.

The West was to be won for civilization, and in pursuance of this decree the Government, through President Washington, sent General St. Clair with two regiments of Regulars and a few Kentucky Militia to establish a military post at the Miami village at the junction of the St. Mary and St. Joseph rivers, now Fort Wayne, Ind., with intermediate points of communication between that point and Fort Washington, now Cincinnati, as a most effectual means of preventing hostilities on the part of the Indians.

After building Fort Hamilton and Fort Jefferson, on the 24th of October General St. Clair began his toilsome march north through the wilderness, cutting that immortal road which has been called "the great Indian trace," or "St. Clair's Wilderness road." On the 3d of November, with a small army of less than 1,500 men, he arrived at a plateau on the east bank of the Wabash River and went into camp. It was General St. Clair's intention to camp here until he could receive supplies and reenforcements. He made the tremendous mistake of not considering the moves of his cunning and bloodthirsty antagonists.

All through the night of the 3d of November the Kentucky Militia complained of "seeing and hearing things," things which to their frontier minds indicated Indian proximity, Indian signs, and Indian danger. So much did these mysterious signs impress them that notice was sent back to General Butler in the night, who held it so slightly and of so little importance as not even to report it to General St. Clair. At daybreak on the 4th of November, 1791, the Indians surprised St. Clair exactly as they had General Braddock forty years before. Two thousand Indians in ambush poured their deadly rifle balls into the ranks of the undisciplined militia, who, seeing no foe, yet beholding their comrades fall on every side, became demoralized and fled to the cover of the Regulars across the river. Brave Colonel Oldham, in a vain effort to rally them, went down to his death.

The Regulars sprang to their arms and fought like heroes against their unseen foes. It was an unequal struggle, however, and they were slowly reduced to the demoralized state of the militia. The Indians had been gathering in great force for weeks on the Miami and Wabash rivers, and combined the fighting braves of the Wyandottes, the Miamis, the Shawnees, Ottawas, Sacs, Foxes, Pottawatomies, and many others from distant Lake Superior. They were commanded by the great chiefs, Little Turtle, Blue Jacket, and Black Eagle, to say nothing of the renegades, Girty and Blackstaffe.

From every side they poured volley after volley into the American ranks, but from no point of the compass was an Indian to be seen. General Butler ordered the cannon to be fired, which was done. Cannon balls crashed through the forest, mowing down trees and scattering undergrowth, without injury to the Indians. The thunderous echoes of the discharge came back upon the ears of our soldiers, coupled with the mocking shouts of the savages, who, from some other point, yelled defiance. The black smoke rose and fell, but the gunners, like the riflemen, saw no target.

Cavalrymen sprang upon their horses and galloped into the woods, but the fire from behind logs and trees soon emptied the saddles, with no one able to see where the firing came from. Regular troops, with cannon in the center and on the flanks, reckless of death, charged among the trees; the warriors melted away before them, and lo, no foe was there! When they fell back upon the mass of the army, however, the Indians swarmed again on every side, their bullets striking on human bodies like the pattering of raindrops on the water.

"Oh, God," groaned a Regular, "If I could only see a single enemy, see something to shoot at," and the next instant that Regular fell dead, shot by a hidden foe.

General Butler was wounded, and General St. Clair, just off a sick couch, was everywhere present rallying his men. Artillery horses were shot down, the groans of the wounded animals being the most pathetic sounds heard on the battlefield. Officers fell like sheep in the shambles, their bravery and epaulets furnishing targets for the savage foe. Step by step the army was driven more and more to the center, steadily down to defeat.

A ball striking General Butler in the side, he fell. Two soldiers carried him to a great heap of knapsacks and propped him up, well knowing that he had met his fate. A savage chief, the great Hoyoquim, the Black Eagle of the Wyandottes, sprang to General Butler's side and with one swift tomahawk stroke clove the General's head to the neck and then quickly escaped to cover. The dead dozens at first became scores and then hundreds. Every one of the Regular officers were killed or wounded. Still the men fought on without officers, fighting bravely for their lives. But the battle was lost beyond all saving, and with over half the army dead or wounded the bugle call for retreat was sounded.

Back over the "Wilderness road" went the fugitives, hard pressed at every step by their victorious foes. The savages knew they had destroyed one-half of the American army, and now redoubled their efforts to destroy the other half. The more experienced frontiersmen shouted, "Every man to his gun and every man to a tree!" and for 5 miles these tactics were employed by our retreating soldiers, until at last the savages gave up the pursuit.

A sad day was that! Gen. Richard Butler dead; Colonel Oldham dead; 3 majors, Ferguson, Hart, and Clark, dead; 12 captains, Bradford Phelan, Kirkwood, Price, Van Swearingen, Tipton, Purdy, Smith, Piatt, Gaither, Crebbs, and Newman, called to their long home; 10 lieutenants, Spear, Warren, Boyd, McMath, Burgess, Kelso, Read, Little, Hopper, and Likens, summoned to their eternal rest; 8 ensigns, Cobb, Balch, Chase, Turner, Wilson, Brooks, Beatty, and Purdy, down to rise no more; 2 quartermasters, 2 adjutants, and 23 other officers, besides 630 American soldiers, had paid the full measure of devotion to their country, and their fate was the Indian tomahawk and scalping knife and their remains left to bleach and rot on that ill-fated battlefield.

If fame is the fragrance of heroic deeds, then are these men entitled to the rewards of fame and a grateful country should hasten to pay the debt it owes. Cicero called gratitude the mother of all virtues, and a virtuous and grateful country can not longer wait to show its affection and reverence for these illustrious men. [Applause.] Gratitude is not only the memory we carry in mind, but the homage of the heart speaking in befitting monuments. An earthly immortality belongs to every brave soldier, and he is entitled to be embalmed with the monuments of his country.

Something more than two years later Gen. Anthony Wayne with his conquering legion recaptured this old battle ground, and on the spot where General St. Clair was defeated erected a double log fort, which, in honor of the event, he named "Fort Recovery." Somewhat later, in 1794, another battle was fought at Fort Recovery, continuing for two days, in which Major McMahon, Captain Hartshorn, Lieutenant Craig, and 19 other officers and 120 soldiers laid down their lives in a victorious defense of the old fort against almost overwhelming odds.

On September 10, 1851, on a day never to be forgotten, 5,000 citizens of this country gathered at Fort Recovery to honor these illustrious dead by a reinterment of their bones.

These citizens provided thirteen gigantic coffins for the reception of the bones. Thirteen caskets! What a remarkable number! The men who once animated these bones were from every State in the Union. These men came from each of the thirteen old Colonies, the magnificent forerunners of the original thirteen States. These heroes had fought for the independence of the Colonies and were citizens of the thirteen States. As ragged Continental soldiers they had upheld the doctrine of American freedom against British aggression and had emerged from that splendid struggle as victorious soldiers of a new-born nation.

They had seen service with Washington, and Greene, and Marion, and were led at the time of their death by the great Revolutionary generals, St. Clair, Butler, and Wayne. These bones, in the aggregate, represented the Continental soldiery of every colony from Massachusetts to Georgia, and in their totality represented the proud glories of Bunker Hill, of Saratoga, Princeton, Trenton, Kings Mountain, Camden, and Yorktown. These were the bones of an illustrious phalanx of Revolutionary heroes, and it was singularly appropriate that thirteen caskets, representing the glorious old thirteen colonies for which they fought in their younger days, and the thirteen States, constituting the latest-born nation of the earth, for which they laid down their lives, should be selected to hold their remains. The assembled bones of these soldiers required caskets of great size and 104 pallbearers for their manipulation. Gen. James Watson Riley directed the ceremonies, and a procession more than a mile in length accompanied the caskets to their last resting place in the graves on the very ground made famous by their death.

It is our supreme duty to preserve the liberties and the institutions for which these heroes laid down their lives. We enjoy these gifts as an inheritance won for us by these illustrious fathers. Living, these patriots were animated by a single purpose; the cause of one was the cause of all.

"In this harmony and unity is crystallized all the poetry and beauty, not only of nationality, but also of social unity and personal brotherhood. Let the youth of to-day be taught to properly appreciate the privileges they enjoy; let them be impressed with the sacrifices these institutions cost; and above all, let them be taught the true principles of government, and the future of our land will be most triumphantly assured." The monuments we rear to our soldier dead are milestones of educative progress for our youth, pointing them to the deeds of their fathers and exhorting them to follow in their illustrious steps. Let them meet arches and memorial shafts everywhere, in order that the fire of patriotism may not be dimmed in their hearts, nor the great American love of country go out forever. [Applause.]

Looking outward across the beautiful Potomac you see spread before you America's magnificent resting place for its illustrious dead—the Arlington of American patriotism and devotion. From the triumphal shafts which mark the graves of the officers we turn aside to look upon the resting place of an army of private soldiers. Beneath the grand old trees these white stones glisten, not so grand and stately, but none the less sacred to the American people.

All honor to Arlington and still greater honor to the sentiment which makes Arlington great.

"They gave their honors to the world,
Their blessed part to heaven,
And sleep in peace."

But is that enough? Shall these deathless heroes be covered with the trappings of glory while the heroes of Fort Recovery rest in the ashes of oblivion and sleep on forever in unmarked graves? Has the devotion which created Arlington fled from the minds of men? Are we as a nation exhausted by the tremendous accomplishments of our past and thereby excluded from further anticipation in deeds of honor and devotion for the future? Has the soul fire of love burned to the socket, reducing future Arlingtons and future monuments to the level of sentimentality? Do we acknowledge ourselves surpassed in deeds of love and sit down to recount our departed glory and strength? God forbid such a fate. Let us hope that what we have done is but the beginning of what we will yet do in the future to prove our appreciation of our heroic dead.

We are a great, a rich, a most powerful nation, with an influence that makes itself felt in every part of the habitable globe. We spend millions of dollars on hundreds of objects to maintain our proud position among the peoples of the earth. Shall we hesitate to spend a few thousand dollars on a monument for our soldier dead? Are we too poor to honor the graves of men who died that our greatness and wealth might be increased a hundred, yes, a thousand fold? What are $35,000 compared with the heroism, the sacrifice, the self-abnegation, and the memory of this immortal thousand that sleep in oblivion on the battle ground of St. Clair's defeat, and the selfsame battle ground of Wayne's decisive triumph? Shall we save money at the expense of our gratitude, at the expense of our devotion, at the expense of all our higher and nobler parts? Shall we forget the dead in order to save our gains? Is the great home in the American hearts not large enough to admit to honorable place the memory of the thousand Revolutionary soldiers that sleep at Fort Recovery, forgotten for more than one hundred years? Of the millions we spent on the Army, the Navy, the Philippines, the Panama Canal, and other worthy objects, can not a crumb be dropped to honor the memory of dead like the illustrious dead at Fort Recovery?

One of our great American poets has said:

And does Columbia love her dead?
No word of praise or honor can be said,
No language has been given to our race,
No monument has majesty or grace,
Naught that can feeling to expression wed,
May say how well we love our soldier dead.

Are these words but flowers of our language gathered into a beautiful bouquet and used by soldiers and citizens on Decoration Days merely, or are they the outpouring of the soul binding us by action and gratitude to heroes we praise and revere? The tenderest and best words become anchors of hope and levers of power when they impel us to proclaim by act and deed a sentiment of devotion for the dead—a sentiment which should nestle proudly and securely in its rightful home, the heart of the true American. [Applause.]

Monuments elongate the memories of heroes and emphasize their transcendent virtues. They are, in fact, beacons planted on the grave of virtue pointing proudly to heaven. Great deeds shall live on and on forever, and this monumental shaft of love insures their perpetuity.

I do not ask for much. My bill calls for a pittance, and a miserable pittance at that. Soldiers who walk boldly into battle for their country and are carried out of it deserve a register greater than the weeds of oblivion, for they loved their country's good more than they loved their lives. They were armed sentinels, guarding liberty, innocence, and right, and deserve the tribute I ask. To honor these men is our present duty, and every duty we omit obscures some truth. Truths are the clothes of the dead, and we shall but pay a tardy debt when we proclaim by the monument that we shall build the truths concerning the heroes of Fort Recovery. [Applause.]

It is to the everlasting credit of the late Senator Hanna, one of Ohio's great statesmen, that he felt the force of this demand. Before his death he introduced a bill having for its object to the very thing that I am asking now.

Mr. Chairman, every man sleeping in these unmarked graves was an American—a hero—every one of them contributed an undying part to the winning of the West; many of them were soldiers of the Revolutionary war—men who, from 1776 to 1783, fought to create the country, at whose after call they gave their lives in 1791 or 1794. They dared the death call of the haughty English foe in our war for independence; they dared the wilderness of the West and died on a field of splendid glory. That field, baptized by tears and dedicated in the blood of our fathers, should be sacred to every American heart and marked by a monument as indestructible as the cause for which they died, and the Government of the United States will not have given these soldiers their just measure of reward until it marks their graves and the ground on which they fell with an imperishable shaft, carrying their memory onward and outward to endless time. [Applause.] Erect it, Mr. Chairman, on the spot where the ashes of these heroes now rest; where they were reinterred with military honors one hundred years after General St. Clair's defeat, and let our country receive the blessings that are bestowed upon the just.

[Senate Report No. 1175. Fifty-eighth Congress, second session.]

For the erection of a memorial structure at Fort Recovery, Ohio.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to erect a suitable memorial structure on the grounds at Fort Recovery, Ohio, where lie buried the remains of Gen. Richard Butler, 630 American soldiers, and 61 officers, who, while under the command of General St. Clair, were slaughtered by the Indians of the Northwest Territory at the battle of Fort Recovery, Ohio, on the morning of November 4, 1791.

SEC. 2. That for the above purpose the sum of $25,000, or as much of said sum as may be necessary, be hereby appropriated, from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. This sum shall be expended by direction of the Secretary of War or such officers as he may designate: Provided, That the money hereby appropriated shall be drawn from time to time only as may be required during the progress of the work and under the requisition of the Secretary.

They report the same favorably, with an amendment.

On page 1, line 4, after the word "memorial," strike out the word "structure" and insert in lieu thereof the word "monument."

As amended it is recommended that the bill do pass.

The proposed legislation has for its purpose the suitable marking of the burial place of Gen. Richard Butler, 61 other officers, and about 630 American soldiers who were slaughtered by the Indians at Fort Recovery, Ohio, while under the command of Gen. Arthur St. Clair.

The battle occurred on November 4, 1791, but the killed were not buried until the following January, at which time a detachment of 150 Kentucky volunteers, under the command of Gen. James Wilkinson, was sent to perform that duty.

The following extracts from The Winning of the West (vol. 4) fully set forth the great disadvantage under which the Americans were compelled to conduct hostilities:

"On November 3 the doomed army, now reduced to a total of about 1,400 men, camped on the eastern fork of the Wabash, high up, where it was but 20 yards wide. There was snow on the ground and the little pools were skimmed with ice. The camp was on a narrow rise of ground where the troops were cramped together, the artillery and most of the horses in the middle. On both flanks, and along most of the rear, the ground was low and wet. All around the wintry woods lay in frozen silence. In front the militia were thrown across the creek and nearly a quarter of a mile beyond the rest of the troops. Parties of Indians were seen during the afternoon, and they skulked around the lines at night, so that the sentinels frequently fired at them. * * *

"On November 4 the men were under arms, as usual, by dawn, St. Clair intending to throw up entrenchments and then make a forced march in light order against the Indian towns. But he was forestalled. Soon after sunrise, just as the men were dismissed from parade, a sudden assault was made upon the militia, who lay unprotected beyond the creek. The unexpectedness and fury of the onset, the heavy firing, and the appalling whoops and yells of the throngs of painted savages threw the militia into disorder. After a few moments' resistance they broke and fled in wild panic to the camp of the Regulars, among whom they drove in a frightened herd, spreading dismay and confusion.

"The drums beat and the troops sprang to arms as soon as they heard the heavy firing at the front; and their volleys for a moment checked the onrush of the plumed woodland warriors. But the check availed nothing. The braves filed off to one side and the other, completely surrounded the camp, killed or drove in the guards and pickets, and then advanced close to the main lines.

"A furious battle followed. After the first onset the Indians fought in silence, no sound coming from them save the incessant rattle of their fire, as they crept from log to log, from tree to tree, ever closer and closer. The soldiers stood in close order, in the open; their musketry and artillery fire made a tremendous noise, but did little damage to a foe they could hardly see. Now and then, through the hanging smoke, terrible figures flitted, painted black and red, the feathers of the hawk and eagle braided in their long scalp-locks; but save for these glimpses the soldiers knew the presence of their somber enemy only from the fearful rapidity with which their comrades fell dead and wounded in the ranks. They never even knew the members or leaders of the Indians. * * * It is said that the chief who led them, both in council and in battle, was Little Turtle, the Miami. At any rate, there were present all the chiefs and picked warriors of the Delawares, Shawnees, Wyandots, and Miamis, and all the most reckless and adventurous young braves from among the Iroquois and the Indians of the Upper Lakes, as well as many of the ferocious whites and half-breeds who dwelt in the Indian villages.

"The Indians fought with the utmost boldness and ferocity, and with the utmost skill and caution. Under cover of the smoke of a heavy but harmless fire from the army they came up so close that they shot the troops down as hunters slaughter a herd of standing buffalo. Watching their chance, they charged again and again with the tomahawk, gliding into close quarters, while their bewildered foes were still blindly firing into the smoke-shrouded woods. The men saw no enemy as they stood in the ranks to load and shoot. In a moment, without warning, dark faces frowned through the haze, the war axes gleamed, and on the frozen ground the weapons clattered as the soldiers fell. As the comrades of the fallen sprang forward to avenge them the lithe warriors vanished as rapidly as they had appeared, and once more the soldiers saw before them only the dim forest and shifting smoke wreaths, with vague half glimpses of the hidden foe, while the steady singing of the Indian bullets never ceased, and on every hand the bravest and steadiest fell one by one. * * *

"Instead of being awed by the bellowing artillery, the Indians made the gunners a special object of attack. Man after man was picked off until every officer was killed but one, who was wounded, and most of the privates also were slain or disabled. The artillery was thus almost silenced, and the Indians, emboldened by success, swarmed forward and seized the guns, while at the same time a part of the left wing of the army began to shrink back. But the Indians were now on comparatively open ground, where the Regulars could see them and get at them, and under St. Clair's own leadership the troops rushed fiercely at the savages with fixed bayonets and drove them back to cover. By this time the confusion and disorder were great, while from every hollow and grass patch, from behind every stump and tree and fallen log the Indians continued their fire. Again and again the officers led forward the troops in bayonet charges, and at first the men followed them with a will. Each charge seemed for a moment to be successful, the Indians rising in swarms and running in headlong flight from the bayonets. In one of the earliest, in which Colonel Darke led his battalion, the Indians were driven several hundred yards, across the branch of the Wabash; but when the colonel halted and rallied his men he found that the savages had closed in behind him, and he had to fight his way back, while the foe he had been driving at once turned and harassed his rear. He was himself wounded and lost most of his command. On reentering camp he found the Indians again in possession of the artillery and baggage, from which they were again driven; they had already scalped the slain who lay about the guns. Maj. Thomas Butler had his thigh broken by a bullet, but he continued on horseback in command of his battalion until the end of the fight, and led his men in one of the momentarily successful bayonet charges. The only Regular regiment present lost every officer killed or wounded. The commander of the Kentucky Militia, Colonel Oldham, was killed early in the action, while trying to rally his men and damning them for cowards.

"The charging troops could accomplish nothing permanent. The men were too clumsy and ill trained in forest warfare to overtake their fleet, half-naked antagonists. The latter never received the shock; but though they fled they were nothing daunted, for they turned the instant the battalion did and followed firing. They skipped out of reach of the bayonets and came back as they pleased, and they were only visible when raised by a charge. * * *

"As the officers fell the soldiers, who at first stood up bravely enough, gradually grew disheartened. No words can paint the hopelessness and horror of such a struggle as that in which they were engaged. They were hemmed in by foes who showed no mercy and whose blows they could in no way return. If they charged, they could not overtake the Indians, and the instant the charge stopped the Indians came back. If they stood, they were shot down by an unseen enemy; and there was no stronghold, no refuge, to which to flee.

"The Indian attack was relentless and could neither be avoided, parried, nor met by counter assault. For two hours or so the troops kept up a slowly lessening resistance, but by degrees their hearts failed. The wounded had been brought toward the middle of the lines, where the baggage and tents were, and an ever-growing proportion of unwounded men joined them. In vain the officers tried by encouragement, by jeers, by blows, to drive them back to the fight. They were unnerved. * * *

"There was but one thing to do. If possible, the remnant of the army must be saved, and it could only be saved by instant flight, even at the cost of abandoning the wounded. The broad road by which the army had advanced was the only line of retreat. The artillery had already been spiked and abandoned. Most of the horses had been killed, but a few were still left, and on one of these St. Clair mounted. He gathered together those fragments of the different battalions which contained the few men who still kept heart and head and ordered them to charge and regain the road from which the savages had cut them off. Repeated orders were necessary before some of the men could be roused from their stupor sufficiently to follow the charging party, and they were only induced to move when told that it was to retreat.

"Colonel Darke and a few officers placed themselves at the head of the column, the coolest and boldest men drew up behind them, and they fell on the Indians with such fury as to force them back well beyond the road. This made an opening through which * * * the troops 'pressed like a drove of bullocks.' The Indians were surprised by the vigor of the charge and puzzled as to its object. They opened out on both sides and half the men had gone through before they fired more than a chance shot or two. They then fell on the rear and began a hot pursuit. St. Clair sent his aid, Denny, to the front to try to keep order, but neither he nor anyone else could check the flight. Major Clark tried to rally his battalion to cover the retreat, but he was killed and the effort abandoned. * * *

"Six hundred and thirty men had been killed and over 280 wounded; less than 500, only about a third of the whole number engaged in battle, remained unhurt. But one or two were taken prisoners, for the Indians butchered everybody, wounded or unwounded, who fell into their hands. * * *

"In the following January Wilkinson, with 150 mounted volunteers, marched to the battlefield to bury the slain. The weather was bitterly cold, snow lay deep on the ground, and some of the volunteers were frost-bitten. Four miles from the scene of battle, where the pursuit had ended, they began to find the bodies on the road and close alongside in the woods, whither some of the hunted creatures had turned at the last to snatch one more moment of life. Many had been dragged from under the snow and devoured by wolves. The others lay where they had fallen, showing as mounds through the smooth, white mantle that covered them. On the battlefield itself the slain lay thick, scalped, and stripped of all their clothing which the conquerors deemed worth taking. The bodies, blackened by frost and exposure, could not be identified, and they were buried in a shallow trench in the frozen ground. The volunteers then marched home.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, during the last few years I have several times introduced bills having for their object changes in the tariff and making modifications with reference to duties which it seemed to me were especially objectionable and especially defenseless. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that in these measures I can not flatter myself that I have received a very large degree of encouragement from the majority of my associates. I have sometimes felt that a bill seeking to modify the tariff, in the Committee on Ways and Means as now constituted, had about the same prospect of a favorable report as a bill imposing a severe penalty on bigamy would have if introduced into a Congress composed of Mormons. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Chairman, I have persevered, and in the present Congress introduced a bill having for its object taking off the duties on lumber of any sort, on print paper, wood pulp, and works of art. I have felt a certain degree of encouragement because the President of the United States has very recently called the attention of Congress and the country to at least one portion of the measure covered by that bill, and that is the duty on print paper and wood pulp.

Now, the President of the United States, Mr. Chairman, as we all know, has long been in sympathy with the cause of tariff reform and tariff revision, and yet I must admit that in that cause he has not shown all the zeal and the ardor which he has displayed in some matters to which he has turned his attention. [Laughter.]

He has proceeded in the attack upon the bulwarks with a certain degree of calm deliberation that has not always been characteristic of him as a commander. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I find no fault. I recognize the fact that introducing a bill by a Republican Member to modify the tariff may be compared to the man that takes part in the charge of a forlorn hope; the forlorn hope is a proper place for the private; the private can go on, and if he loses his life no great harm be done. The commander, on the other hand, the general in chief, judiciously turns his attention to the enterprise in which the probability of success is greater and the possibility of danger is somewhat less.

I desire to say a word about the duty on works of art. This really stands in a very peculiar position. I have never found anyone who either wanted the duty or defended it. Our own artists do not want it. They are eager for its repeal. All patrons of arts, all public institutions, all good citizens join in reprobating it.

It is not required as a productive duty, and yet only as this is it sought to be defended. The richest government in the world, with a surplus on hand of hundreds of millions, certainly does not have to eke out its income by imposing a duty on works of art. We had far better pay a bounty for their introduction than impose a duty that tends to check their purchase.

It is said that this duty is imposed only upon private purchasers and not upon purchases made for public museums. But most of the art wealth, which becomes the property of the public, comes indirectly from private collectors. Rich men buy works of art and enjoy them in their own lifetime, but a large portion of them are finally given to the public. The public galleries are not rich. They must depend upon private generosity if they are ever to obtain large stores of artistic value.

Even so far as works of art remain private property, they furnish pleasure of a high order; they educate, they elevate. A tax on them, together with a tax on books, would seem to be the most ill-advised imposition that a so-called "enlightened government," could impose; and, moreover, the beautiful things which educate the taste of the few sooner or later become the property of the nation. Then they educate the taste; they refine the manners; they add to the happiness of all.

The great art treasures of the Louvre and of the British national gallery would not have been accumulated for the instruction and delight of their nations and of all nations, if taxes had been imposed checking the introduction of works of art into those countries. It has been reserved for our own Congress to select a method of taxation which was never resorted to even by the most stupid of Bourbon kings or the most wrongheaded of Stuart sovereigns. For these many long years this provision has stood on our statute book unhonored, undefended, unrepealed.

Mr. Chairman, the duty on lumber has always seemed to me a strange one to have been imposed, and a still stranger one so long to have continued, because the diminution of our forests is an evil recognized by all. The Forester, Mr. Pinchot, tells us that in twenty or twenty-five years at the present rate of consumption the forests of this country will be largely a thing of the past, a result fraught with untold evil. On the one hand we are spending millions of dollars, and I think spending them wisely, in acquiring a national domain by means of which our forests may be preserved, the supply of our rivers may be continued, the possibility of countless thousands and hundreds of thousands of acres becoming useless may be averted; and on the other hand, when it comes to the consumption of lumber, when it comes to allowing the growing evil to be averted by the introduction of foreign lumber, we continue to impose a duty upon it.

It is, Mr. Chairman, a thing of more than questionable wisdom. There is another thing to be considered which, in reference to the question of lumber, has always struck me as peculiarly unfortunate. Who are the people upon whom any increase in the price of lumber falls? There is no increase in cost, except possibly an increase in the cost of what is eaten, that falls upon so large a class. Every man who builds a frame house has to pay more if the price of lumber is higher. Every man that puts up a fence around his farm has to pay more if the price of lumber is higher. When it comes to the profits, to those who gain by the imposition of the duty, a thing that always, of course, we should carefully consider, I doubt if there is any great commodity in the country which is in the hands of so small a number of people. A few great corporations, a few multimillionaires, own the great bulk of the timber land of the United States, and so any duty which has for its result to enhance the price of lumber brings an increased gain to a very small class and imposes an increased cost upon every man that lives who builds a wooden house and every man who burns a cord of wood.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me a duty little to be defended. Of course no one is so foolish as to say that the increase in the price of lumber is entirely caused by the duty, because the decrease in the forests, the diminution in the total amount of timber, is of course the great cause; but so far as we do anything by legislation to increase the cost by one dollar or one cent a cord, certainly to that extent it is injurious legislation. It would be wiser, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, with a view to preserving the timber of the country, with a view to lessening the price of wood that a man burns in his home and puts in the house that he erects to cover his family, to impose a bounty—if ever bounties were to be offered—on every stick of timber imported into this country from another land, rather than imposing a duty that, so far as it goes, tends to keep out lumber grown in other countries.

Mr. Chairman, I want in the very brief time I have to say a few words in reference to a corporation largely before the country—that is, the International Paper Company, which certainly has been a large consumer of our diminishing stock of wood, and has shown no readiness either to abate the price of the product which it sells or to open the markets more widely to the introduction of resources from other lands. The other day the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TIRRELL], a most genial and charming gentleman as we all know, gave us his views, based somewhat upon personal experience, in reference to the International Paper Company. He himself, it seems, is one of those who had to do with its formation, and I doubt not, and I sincerely hope, profited by its gains.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to correct the statement just made by the gentleman. I had nothing whatever to do with the formation of the company.

Mr. PERKINS. At all events, I would like to say a few words in reference to the formation of this corporation, and some particulars of its history which I think are instructive as a part of our financial history. The price of paper years ago was high—the print paper that goes into the newspapers I mean by that. During a long period of years the price of print paper—the paper used for newspapers—tended downward, and that has been the history of many branches of great products. The price of steel rails, for instance, is very much lower than it was thirty or forty years ago. The improvements in manufacture, the improvements in material, the development of commerce and industry, tends, if nothing occurs to check its course, to lessen the price of most of the great manufactured products, and in reference to print paper there were special reasons. Formerly paper was largely made out of rags. Then ingenious persons discovered that paper could be made out of wood pulp. That worked a great diminution in the price. Improvements were made—the improvements that result in every great industry from the ingenuity of man—and as a result the price of paper used for newspapers tended downward.

Now, from that came certain results, partly beneficial, and some of them perhaps less beneficial. The beneficial one, which we will all confess, was the lowering in the price of newspapers. Everybody knows that in late years you can buy a paper for 1 cent or 2 cents, whereas thirty or forty years ago a 1-cent newspaper was a thing almost unknown. I do not know but that it was wholly unknown. That was made possible to a considerable extent by the lowering of the price of paper. There has been another result which, I am free to say, I regard as much less beneficial, because the newspapers which are sold to us of thirty or forty pages, especially on Sundays, have been made possible as commercial enterprises by the lowering of the price of print paper, and whether that is a blessing is a thing to be considered. But at all events the price of print paper tended downward, and that being the case, about ten years ago, in 1898, I think it was, the International Paper Company was organized.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not at all, as I am sure my associates in the House know, a person who rants in reference to great enterprises and talks about octopuses, but I think that we may examine, with profit to all, the history of some of them. The first thing that was done prior to the organization of the International Paper Company was to raise the duty. The duty on print paper at that time was $3, which was more than sufficient. It was more than was required to cover any difference in the price of labor between the labor of this country and the labor in Canada or in any other country, because, as a matter of fact, with a duty of $3 no print paper came into the country at all at that period. But, with a prudent regard for future development, the duty, which was already prohibitory, of $3 was raised to $6. Then the duty on wood pulp was raised about 33 per cent, from about $1.28 to about $1.67, and after those changes had been made the International Paper Company was organized.

Now, my friend from Massachusetts the other day, who alluded in such tender terms to its financial history and its career, did not furnish us all its statistics, although those which he did furnish were entirely correct. That company was organized with a capital and bonded indebtedness of about $50,000,000—bonds of about $10,000,000; preferred stock at 6 per cent, $22,000,000, and of common stock they issued about $18,000,000. Those are not the precise figures, but they are near enough, thus making a total capitalization of $50,000,000. My friend said: "Why complain of greed? They have not been able to pay a dividend on their capital of $50,000,000." And they have not; but it is for us to see, Mr. Chairman, what that capitalization represented, how far it represented value and how far it represented water—not water to be used in the manufacture of paper, but water used solely in the manufacture of stock.

Mr. LAMB. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. LAMB. Just for one question. I see you are talking from your shoulder, and I think now you would be ready to withdraw the point of order you made against the paragraph in the agricultural appropriation bill instructing the Secretary of Agriculture to find new materials for making paper.

Mr. PERKINS. My friend is wrong in his recollection. I did not make the point of order on the amendment as finally offered, that they should simply investigate and see out of what materials paper could be made. I did raise the point of order against their going into the paper business——

Mr. LAMB. Covering the very ground you are now arguing.

Mr. PERKINS. The International Paper Company was made up by a large number of mills. Some of them were good and some of them were bad. Some of them were worth a good deal and a good many were worth nothing, and the capitalization was produced by the process by which they were taken in. There was, for instance, one paper-mill company with a capital of $500,000, a prosperous company. There were issued to it of the securities of the International Paper Company, $2,250,000.

It was taken in at the very comfortable basis of 450. Another company had a capital stock of $500,000, a less prosperous company. It got in securities of the new company $2,000,000. There was another mill that, as those familiar with those things say, had not earned a dividend, and it was impossible to see how it should ever earn a dividend. It was taken in at $800,000, payable in securities. There were large mills and large paper properties in my own State of New York that had much to do with the organization. They were taken in at $8,000,000, and I have never met any man who said that anyone would have been foolish enough to buy them and pay for them in money $4,000,000. In addition to these plants and as illustrating the manner in which this organization was made, there were included in these purchases ninety-eight machines used for making paper. Now, of those machines it is said that more than fifty were old and practically had become obsolete by the progress of the art. But they were all purchased. There was one of the machines at one of the mills up in our own State which Mr. Warner Miller, one of the originators of this company, had worked on, it was said, when he was a boy.

It had, therefore, undoubtedly a great sentimental value to those who formed this corporation. It certainly had no other value, because for years and years its value as a practical machine had ceased. That was among the stock that was included in the property that was turned in to the International Paper Company. Those familiar with mills, and I have talked with many of them, say that $15,000,000 would have been a fair estimate of the market value of all the mills and plants that were taken into this corporation. It had to earn, and it started to earn, on $50,000,000. My friend from Massachusetts says it has never paid dividends on its common stock. I must contradict my friend, or, rather, say that my friend is mistaken——

Mr. TIRRELL. I made the statement they had paid two dividends in the first two years of their organization, in 1898, but have not paid any since.

Mr. PERKINS. I can speak, Mr. Chairman, from a clear recollection, because I was myself, with a friend, a purchaser, and that is why, to some extent, I am fairly familiar with the International Paper Company. I was the owner of common stock only, unfortunately, instead of being an organizer and an insider like my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. TIRRELL]. I was an outsider to whom a certain amount of this common stock was sold. The $17,000,000 of common stock represented nothing in actual value, but it was divided around among those who put in their properties. Perhaps my friend got some. I do not know whether he did or not. If he did not, other organizers did. Of course I do not think the people in the company ever supposed it would be possible to pay the interest on $10,000,000 of bonds, dividends on $22,000,000 of preferred stock, and also on $17,000,000 of common stock. But it was perfectly possible to sell that to an eager public; and for that purpose, during two years, dividends at the rate of 4 per cent on the common stock were paid, and during that time I have no doubt that all the insiders, my friend included, disposed of their common stock with the greatest rapidity. [Laughter.]

There is a thing which we can always notice, Mr. Chairman, and that is when it comes to some specially profitable provision of any tariff law, to some specially possible combination of business interests, no party lines are drawn. Our friends the Democrats, quite as much as the Republicans, are glad to avail themselves of that opportunity and to reap the profits, and so in the International Paper Company one of the towers of strength in that corporation was Mr. Roswell P. Flower, who was, as we all know, a tower of strength in the Democratic party, a Democratic governor, a great financier down in Wall street and a great banker there. And I remember in connection with this modest investment that my friend and myself made in that common stock that it was selling at 40 to 50 and paying 4 per cent, and it looked nice. I saw an interview in the paper with Mr. Flower at one time where he called attention to the organization of the International Paper Company, wherein he told how cheaply they had gotten their plants, at what low prices they had acquired their property from my friend from Massachusetts and elsewhere, and as a result what future profits would inure, especially on the common stock, after paying the dividends on preferred with the profits of this organization.

I remember that, because on that statement, my friend and myself made our modest investment. A year or two after that, when the stock was selling at 20, when dividends had ceased—and they have ceased from that time to this time—Mr. Flower was called away to his fathers. I remember looking with interest at the inventory of his property, and we discovered that, among other assets, amounting altogether to many millions, there was just exactly, if I remember correctly, one share, worth $100, of the common stock of the International Paper Company. [Laughter.] The stock we bought, I presume, was supplied to us by Mr. Flower or other insiders out of a benevolent desire to let the public into a good thing. I have seen, Mr. Chairman, that four of those who were largely instrumental in the formation of the International Paper Company, died leaving fortunes in excess of $1,000,000, and at such results I am not surprised. Well, now, about the profits, and this illustrates the possibility of profits in our great land, because it was made not only from dividends on the large volume of preferred stock but the $17,000,000 of common stock, which was sold at an average of 40 per cent, was disposed of to the public while dividends were being paid, so that would be called a by-product of this corporation [laughter], and that would yield a profit of $7,000,000, which is not to be despised. [Laughter.]

So the company was launched; it was badly launched, because it had a great number of plants, some of them of very small value, bought at a high price, and it was a badly managed business. Formerly active competition from all the world stimulated activity. The manufacture of paper improved, and the price of paper lessened. As a result of changes in the tariff the possibility of competition from any other country was shut off. It was claimed that in having all of the plants, or a large proportion of the plants, gathered in one whole, there would be great economy and great reform. It has not been made. It is no doubt true they are making more paper than ever, but the fact is that they have not secured economy in making it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. Just let me finish this one sentence. These economies were made. It is stated that the salary of the president of the new corporation was fixed at $50,000—a very favorite form of economy. The department managers, who have been receiving $7,500, went into the new company at salaries of $15,000. Such economies blossomed in the International Paper Company, but there were no others. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PERKINS. It does not seem to me that such a development of American industry needs the interposition of the Government to increase its gains. The price of paper has been increased, and whether we attribute this to the tariff, which operates to the extent of $6 per ton, or to the increase in the price of lumber that results in part from the fact that we shut out foreign lumber and wood pulp, this affects injuriously the newspapers of the land.

If we consider the interests of labor, the newspapers employ forty men to one employed by the manufacturer of print paper. This business, in addition, is one of the most rapid agents in the depletion of our forests. Every year, so the Government Forester tells us, the trees that are cut off in this country to be ground up into wood pulp would cover an area almost as large as the State of Rhode Island. Here also, it seems to me, it would be wiser to pay a bonus on the wood pulp that could be brought in from other countries, and thus save our own forests, than to impose a tariff to keep it out.

I remember seeing that proceedings were to be taken a year or two ago for the dissolution of the International Paper Company. I believe that proceedings are not actually commenced, and it is of very little importance whether they are or not. Love laughs at the locksmith, and the trusts can well laugh at the Attorney-General. In so far as such combinations are the results of business conditions, they will not be put an end to by all the attorneys-general in the world. Fines can be imposed for a violation of the provisions of law, and in such a case as that of the Standard Oil Company they can be so severe as to be serious and, against a weaker combination, destructive; but where a combination of capital naturally results from business conditions, its dissolution will merely mean a new combination, with such changes as may be required to evade the decision. If I am right, the Standard Oil Company in some of its forms has been dissolved by decrees of the court; but while the joint ownership of the property remains, the joint action is sure to go on in some other form.

To no branch of public activity has more attention been given. In no department has there been as ostentatious sounding of trumpets and beating of drums as in proceedings brought to dissolve combinations that were claimed to be contrary to law. I doubt if any branch of public activity has been less important to the public good.

The nation hung in suspense over the decision of the Northern Securities case. The success of the Government was loudly applauded by excited admirers, but the ownership of the railroads affected remained the same. The control has remained the same, except as it has been affected, not by legislation, but by voluntary transfer. If the conditions of railroad travelers or shippers of freight or any other business conditions in the Northwest have been affected by the decision of the court in the Northern Securities case I have yet to find out the fact. Apparently the only people affected were the stockholders. The quotations on their stock advanced enormously after the Government had obtained a legal victory that was supposed to check their illegal desire for undue gain.

The legislation that affects combinations is not found in suits to dissolve charters, which, if the ownership of the property continues the same, usually means only a new job for an astute lawyer in preparing a new charter. But, as these combinations are the outgrowth of conditions, so legislation that affects the conditions will surely affect them. The action to dissolve the International Paper Company, if successful, would mean only the formation of a new international paper company. An action was brought and resulted in the dissolution of a similar combination in the West. The gentleman from Nebraska told us that this resulted in the temporary lowering in the price he paid for his paper, but soon prices were restored, and he met with the same combination of interests that he had before. To adopt the language used by the trade, they soon found that the same parties in interest were carrying on business at the old stand in the old way in a new shape. In forming any effective combination the restriction of the field is of infinite importance. It is very much easier to combine the interests of one country than it is the interests of all the world. I doubt if anyone thinks that the International Paper Company would have ever been formed if Congress ten years ago had not placed a duty of $6 on paper and $1.63 on wood pulp.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. MCKINLAY].

Mr. MCKINLAY of California. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to get an opportunity to say a few words in support of the general proposition of developing a large navy for the United States. But at the same time I want to say that I will be in favor of the recommendation of the minority, which is in favor of four battle ships instead of two. Perhaps it is because I represent a district which fronts for nearly 250 miles upon the Pacific Ocean and which has also 40 miles of bay front on the Bay of San Francisco, that I have given the subject of oriental trade and the prospect of American influence in the Orient special consideration.

In the district that I have the honor to represent there are a great many who are engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States and Alaska, and many others in trade with nations across the Pacific Ocean, and I believe it is the unanimous opinion on the part of those who are best qualified to form an opinion and express it, that the time has come when it is necessary that the Pacific Ocean shall have a squadron of battle ships and cruisers permanently stationed in her waters as strong as that which is maintained upon the Atlantic. It seems to me that there never was a time in the history of the nation when we were so fortuitously situated in regard to an opportunity to secure foreign trade and commerce as we are to-day. And I apply this remark particularly to the developing markets of the countries of Asia.

But I believe that the first element necessary to enable us to secure oriental trade and an output for our products to the lands of the East is to maintain a sufficient degree of naval strength upon the Pacific Ocean, not to invite war, but to guard against it. It will only be under a sense of security and protection against seizure and spoliation growing out of international complications that an American merchant marine will be developed that will furnish the means by which the products of the United States may be distributed throughout the countries surrounding the Pacific Ocean, in which we hope to obtain at some time an extensive market for American products.

In this connection I would like to call the attention of gentlemen to some of the present economic conditions of the United States. Within the last ten years the wealth of the United States has more than doubled. We have been told that in 1897 our national wealth approximated $65,000,000,000. The best statisticians of the country to-day tell us that our wealth is now in the neighborhood of $120,000,000,000. One gentleman on the other side in debate a few days ago fixed the wealth of the United States at $150,000,000,000. This sum, however, I believe to be in excess of the actual present sum total of our national wealth.

But, nevertheless, the accumulation of national wealth within the last ten years has been enormous and never paralleled in the history of any country of the world. This great accumulation of national wealth has multiplied the capital of the country, and out of this increased capital fund have come the necessary means to capitalize the great manufacturing plants of the United States, those industrial factors which have become the phenomena of our industrial development in the last decade. The great increase of national wealth has also placed at the command of enterprise the enormous wage fund necessary to be used in the payment of the army of workers employed in those industries. And the result is that in the wise cooperation of abundant capital and abundant labor the United States has developed her manufactures within the last ten years to such an extent that last year the industries of the nation produced nearly fifteen billions of manufactured products.

The output of the mills and factories of the country during the last year was supplemented by seven and one-half billions of dollars of farm products. To this must be added four or five billions of dollars of products from the mines and the forests. Now, the great proportion of all this output of the productive factors of the United States was consumed at home; but still nearly two billions of it were compelled to find a market abroad. Nearly eight hundred millions of manufactured products were compelled to secure an outside market. In the operation of the industrial systems of the United States, we to-day employ, directly and indirectly, over 15,000,000 wage-earners. Therefore it is most essential that our goods should find a market in order that our manufactures should remain in operation and our workers remain in steady employment. If our products are not sold at home to the limit of our producing capacity or the surplus can not find a market abroad, it means that month by month it will pile up unsold and have a most depressing influence upon industries at home, and ultimately cause their suspension of activity or actual cessation for a time at least. This means, of course, the loss of labor and the consequent loss of wages. Now, out on the Pacific Ocean there is a chance for the United States to avoid the possibility of a surplus product being accumulated in the United States for many years to come by simply seizing the present opportunity and quickly laying the foundation of a future trade with the nations bordering that great ocean.

Over in Asia is the future market of the world, but as yet America seems to be ignoring her possibilities in that quarter. Those who can see the trend of the world's development are beginning to realize at last that the prophecy of Baron von Humboldt, uttered in the year 1800, was a true prophecy, and that the predictions of Seward, uttered over forty years ago, are coming true—that the Pacific Ocean in its relation to the United States, in its relation to the commerce and trade of the world, will some day be the same to America as the Mediterranean was to the Empire of Rome, and that the seats of power of the greatest nations of the earth will be on the Pacific shores.

Around the shores of that ocean, in Asia and Australasia alone, are 823,000,000 of the peoples of the world. I am only giving you the figures from Australia, New Zealand, the French East Indies, British India, Japan, Korea, Persia, Siam, and China, and not speaking of the Philippine Islands or any of the countries along the American continent. Last year those countries imported $1,270,000,000 worth of products. Only $109,000,000 of this product came from the United States.

In this connection I desire to insert in the RECORD a tabulation of the territorial area, the population, the total imports and exports of those countries, and the proportion now secured by the United States. A study of this tabulation should show the unbounded possibilities of oriental trade and the necessity of maintaining a Pacific Ocean fleet adequate to foster and protect that trade.

The events which followed the victory at Manila and our occupation of the Philippine Islands have thrown us into a position in the Pacific Ocean which should, and I believe does, make us, even at this time, the dominating power of Asia. The attitude which our nation took toward China when the Boxer troubles were on in that country, when President McKinley and Secretary Hay held back the greedy hands of the nations of Europe who wished to dismember her—this attitude undoubtedly gave us a standing and a position of influence in China with her four hundred and thirty-odd millions of people that is enjoyed by no other country of the world, and there is a growing disposition as a consequence on the part of China to trade and do business with the United States.

Again, in Japan there are over 47,000,000 people on a territory of only 140,000 square miles, but still our trade is growing with Japan despite the fears of many that we may have war with that Empire. And despite commercial rivalries growing out of commercial and industrial competition for oriental markets between ourselves and Japan, I believe that our trade will year by year expand in that quarter. So with India, Korea, and Australia our trade must necessarily and naturally increase as the years go on if we now are wise as a people seeking trade and commerce with the world and take proper means to secure our share. I believe the first step necessary is to as quickly as possible to build up a strong, up-to-date navy, a navy large enough to permit the sending of our ships to every port of the Orient, so in time of expected or unexpected danger they may give protection to American citizens and guarantee safety to American interests, and more especially insure to American shippers protection for their goods in American bottoms. A strong navy will be the sure forerunner of a much-desired merchant marine for the United States, which, I am sure, all Americans hope to some day see developed to such a magnitude that it will float our merchant flags upon not only the Pacific, but over all the seas of the world.

Why should America not be the dominating power of the Pacific Ocean? Turn to the map and follow the coast line 3,000 miles along the shores of America proper from Mexico to British Columbia. Then there is Alaska farther north, which ten years ago was counted an asset of little worth. Seward was laughed at forty years ago when he purchased Alaska for $7,200,000; but within the last ten years Alaska has produced $300,000,000 of wealth, which has been turned into the great sum total of the United States. And in Alaska we have untold riches yet undiscovered. That wonderful country has over 26,000 miles of coast line, a coast line which extends from Alaska proper along the Aleutian Island group until the last island almost touches the shores of Japan. On the other side of the Pacific is the Philippine Archipelago, that great group containing over 3,000 islands, 900 of which are inhabited, with a population of 8,000,000 people. The Philippine trade last year amounted to nearly $40,000,000, and yet we secured in the neighborhood of only $6,000,000.

Then toward the center of the Pacific Ocean are the Ladrones and the island of Guam, and between these islands and San Francisco lies the Hawaiian group, which last week only we decided to make the naval outpost of the United States by establishing there a naval station and fortifications that shall be adequate to protect our Pacific coast from the operations of any hostile fleet. To the south is the Canal Zone, a strip of land 10 miles wide extending from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean through the Republic of Panama. These positions of strength and strategy from both a commercial and warlike standpoint give the United States the undoubted domination of the Pacific Ocean, and it compels us as a nation and a people to see to it that we maintain our prestige and advantage by quickly laying the foundations of trade and commerce throughout those islands by opening up channels of communication and transportation that shall carry the output of the mills and factories, looms, forges, and farms of the United States to the markets of the Orient and South America.

Therefore I feel it my duty to not only support the recommendations of the Naval Committee, but also to go further and support the minority of that committee in recommending that the number of battle ships provided for by this session of Congress shall be four instead of two. In doing this I am only indorsing the recommendations of the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Naval Board. Not only are these great authorities of the requirements of the Navy in accord in their recommendations for four battle ships, but Secretaries Root and Taft, and many other leading statesmen of the country who have given the subject of American supremacy in the Pacific Ocean consideration, are in favor of measures that shall undoubtedly develop the naval power in the Pacific Ocean until it shall be adequate to guard every interest of the Republic against any danger that may arise, even though the conflicting nations of Asia should enter into a contest for supremacy and dominion that should revolutionize the whole eastern world.

Mr. McKINLAY of California. Mr. Chairman, I desire leave to print an epitome of the trade of Asia, and also to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I object.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN].

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing I am so reluctant to do as to speak of myself, but in order to emphasize what I wish to say I am obliged to give you a part of my life's story.

My cradle stood on the other side of the ocean, and I was nearly of age when the thought struck me to try my fortune in the great country that from my earliest youth I had heard spoken of as offering the greatest opportunities to anyone who was willing to work, who had the necessary energy and a fair education, and who could not be persuaded to swerve from the path of honor, duty, and honesty.

On my arrival in New York my funds had so dwindled that I would not have been allowed to land had it been some years later, when those in favor of restricting immigration succeeded in having a law passed requiring every immigrant to have a certain amount of money in his possession.

Perhaps anticipating that such an unreasonable law might be enacted, aided by the ever alert Immigration Restriction League, I made haste, slipped through, and after a five days' trip on an emigrant train arrived in what I later on found to be one of the best States in the Union—the great State of Wisconsin.

The same good fortune that finally landed me in the Congress of the United States resulted in my securing a position only a few days after my arrival. My success was beyond my expectations, as a result of not being afraid to work and always trying to do my duty.

I learned to love my adopted land as dearly as anyone loved it whose cradle stood within the borders of the United States. [Applause.]

The Star-Spangled Banner—and may it ever remain the emblem of true liberty—has won my admiration, and I shall never cease to love those who stood by it and defended it in the dark hours of the rebellion.

The patriotism with which I had already become enthused when giving the United States the preference over my native land grew steadily as I learned the ways of this country, acquired full knowledge of its institutions, and studied its glorious history.

No one ever felt more proud of his American citizenship than I did when two years ago I visited Independence Hall and stood in the room in which, one hundred and thirty-one years ago, there assembled those great men who, with true courage and inspired by their patriotism, ready to accept the consequences of their deed, signed one of the grandest documents in the world's history, the Declaration of Independence. [Applause.] To those who are lacking in love of our great and good country I would suggest that they go to that shrine of liberty and imbibe the true spirit of patriotism.

You would hardly think it possible that one as enthusiastic as I am over my adopted country and its institutions could have observed conditions that would wound the pride of any American citizen. The incident to which I refer was brought to my notice when visiting the Fatherland last year.

After roaming around a few days in the great city of Berlin the thought struck me that the American ambassador might be curious to inspect a newly elected Congressman from Wisconsin and ascertain just what a Badger looks like. [Laughter.]

I inquired of a number of persons whom I met, also of some of the generally well-posted policemen, where the United States embassy could be found, but while they knew the location of all the other embassies, including the British, the French, the Spanish, and the Russian, they could not tell me where the United States ambassador held forth. But I soon ceased to express surprise at their lack of information, after I finally succeeded in finding the place, which is marked by a miniature specimen of our glorious Stars and Stripes, dangling from the second-story window of a very ordinary-looking building.

Here the ambassador of the greatest and most prosperous country in the world holds forth, directly above what looked to me to be a second-hand book store.

Directly opposite is the Russian embassy, a building reflecting credit upon that great Empire. A little farther up the street is the French embassy, a structure that impresses one with the wealth and importance of our sister Republic.

Next in point of beauty of architecture is the Spanish embassy, while the British have laid more stress on solidity and firmness, indicative of England's power and magnitude.

How proud the citizens of those countries must be who visit Berlin when they see those beautiful structures owned by the Government of the land they hail from.

How proud they must feel of their citizenship when they observe the large flags of their country floating over the building in which their ambassador holds forth.

Citizens of other countries can not but be impressed by the showing made by these countries, and I am sure that the prestige thus gained returns good interest on the investment.

But no American, be he ever so proud of his citizenship, experienced an increase of pride when he gazed at the second-hand book store, the rooms over which are occupied by the representative of the most prosperous nation of the earth. No American ever looked at that tiny banner, the glorious Stars and Stripes, thrown to the breeze from the second-story window and then glanced at the immense banner floating over the Russian embassy across the street without having his pride as an American citizen severely wounded.

A stranger acting on the impression made by the several embassies would in looking at our dingy quarters, arrive at the conclusion that we were the cheapest and poorest nation on earth.

I believe that even Jefferson, with the simple and plain life that he led, would, if he were alive to-day, insist that we keep step with other nations in housing our representatives in foreign countries. [Applause.]

While I have only referred to our embassy in Berlin, those who have seen the offices occupied by our ambassadors in other European capitals report similar conditions.

Every ambassador or minister of every other nation occupies a building owned by his government, and of which no citizen visiting in those countries need feel ashamed. In addition, the representatives of other nations receive salaries that enable them to live as their positions demand, and to represent their countries so as to reflect credit upon them.

The American ambassadors and ministers, with very scant salaries as compared with other representatives, must, in order to make both ends meet, live in a style which is unworthy of a representative of our great nation, and if relying solely upon their salaries, they can not lend that dignity to their high office which is necessary to properly impress the people and officials of the countries to which they have been sent.

Not wishing to humiliate themselves and their country, many of our most brilliant men possessed of but limtied means have refused to accept these positions which otherwise they would have been well fitted for.

Others again, who thought that with the aid of their private means they might be able to do justice to the position, were forced to abandon their place upon ascertaining that to keep up with representatives of other countries they had to sacrifice all and more than they could call their own.

We certainly have a number of men in both Houses of Congress who would do honor to the position of ambassador or minister in foreign countries, but only a few of them—only men of means—can, under present conditions, afford to accept a place of that character and properly represent our country.

The President in filling these places is therefore obliged to make his selection from the rich men of our country who have abundant means, and who do not rely solely upon their salary to secure whatever is needed to lend dignity to the high office to which they have been appointed.

While the offices occupied by our present ambassador in Germany are far from luxurious, he has helped matters along by leasing a residence that is equal to the finest in the German capital and well fitted to entertain the Emperor and other dignitaries. In doing this he helped materially to further the friendly relations existing between the two countries.

His yearly rental for this building is $20,000, while his salary is but $17,500.

It is certainly contrary to all traditions of our Republic to have only men of wealth represent us in foreign countries, but niggardly as we have been in providing for all ambassadors and ministers, it is very fortunate that our Presidents have always succeeded in finding men for these positions who, besides possessing all-around qualifications, had ample funds to supply whatever necessary to lend dignity to their position.

With our constant claim that in the filling of positions the rich man is given no advantage over the one with limited means or over the poor man, proclaiming as we do equal rights to all, it becomes our plain duty to change conditions so that any American citizen, if intellectually fitted for the position, but not financially so, may hold one of these foreign offices.

We must either pay them salaries to cover all necessary expenses of living, without falling back on their own resources, or, if we are opposed to increasing salaries, we must then furnish our representatives in foreign countries with proper quarters and provide funds for maintaining them.

These buildings need not necessarily be palaces, but they ought to be such as to reflect dignity upon our great country.

It would be unwise and altogether too expensive to immediately provide for proper buildings in all foreign capitals, but we can not afford to wait any longer before making a start in that direction.

A bill introduced by me, No. 9238, authorizes the Secretary of State to acquire in Berlin, Paris, London, and St. Petersburg, proper sites and buildings to be used by the United States ambassadors in those cities, the cost in each case not to exceed $500,000.

If he is so authorized, it may be possible for the Secretary of State to secure buildings in those cities that, offered at a reasonable price, would be suitable for the purpose desired.

If the outlay of $2,000,000 for the embassies I mentioned is not considered wise at this time, let a start be made by appropriating $500,000 for an embassy in Berlin.

By so doing you will at least prevent my pride as an American citizen from receiving another shock, which would surely be the case if on my next visit to Berlin I should again be obliged to cast my eyes upon that diminutive specimen of our glorious banner dangling from the second-story window of the United States ambassador's office, located over a second-hand bookstore. [Applause.]

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I object.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] the rest of the time until 5 o'clock.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, when the Secretary of the Navy announced from his home city of Oakland, Cal., on the 4th day of July, 1907—a most appropriate date, by the way—that a large fleet of battle ships was to visit the Pacific coast, the news aroused the most violent opposition in certain quarters. To now quote some of these spasms of wrath which appeared in portions of the Eastern press seems almost cruel in view of the fact that at this very moment, with the fleet about to enter California ports, after nearly 14,000 miles have been successfully traversed, the cruise has been triumphantly justified in the minds of the American people.

The New York World, for instance, on the morning of July 6, 1907, gravely warned the Commander in Chief in the following words:

> If President Roosevelt seriously meditates sending the battle-ship fleet to the Pacific there is still ample time to prevent what may prove to be a most disastrous blunder. A long ocean cruise of the battle-ship fleet to the Pacific is wholly unnecessary. * * * It is time for Theodore Roosevelt to turn back the tide. It is time for him as President of the United States to announce to all the world that the battle ships of the United States are not going to the Pacific and that this jingo propaganda must cease.

On the following day the World again thundered forth as follows:

> There is no reason known to sensible government or sensible diplomacy why the battle ships should be sent to the Pacific. * * * One simple, plain duty now confronts the President. It is to announce officially, authoritatively, flatly, and positively that the Atlantic fleet will not be sent to the Pacific.

The New York Evening Post was as fully agitated. On the day following the Secretary's announcement it commented as follows:

> We can not too strongly emphasize the folly of any such action. * * * If the battle ships must have a long sea cruise, by all means let them visit Labrador or the Cape of Good Hope or even Madagascar. But on no ground of discipline or efficiency could a voyage to the Pacific rather than to any other seas be justified. * * * We could hardly have a better example of the way a navy, so far from being a safeguard, can become a grave menace to the peace of the nation.

It can scarcely be wondered at that the people of the Far West, having always had cause to believe that the Pacific as well as the Atlantic coast constituted a part of our common country, should evince the greatest astonishment at the expressions of such pronounced opposition following the announcement that a fleet of American battle ships was to visit the Pacific coast. In voting for an adequate Navy your Representatives in Congress from the Far West have always regarded that Navy as national, believing that the Pacific seaboard had just as much share in it and fully as much right to it as the coast bordering on the Atlantic Ocean.

This opposition is all the more striking when the statement is made that at the very moment the news of the projected cruise was given to the world there was not a single American battle ship in commission in the great Pacific Ocean, nor was there a single coast-defense vessel in commission, the Wyoming, the only vessel of that type then there, being at the yard undergoing repairs.

The most effective ships at that time in commission on the Pacific coast were the three semiarmored cruisers Charleston, St. Louis, and Milwaukee, vessels of 9,700 tons and 22 knots speed, protected by a partial and light belt of 4-inch armor and a 3-inch deck, and carrying a battery of fourteen 6-inch guns. The cruisers California and South Dakota were on the coast, but not then in commission. The protected cruisers Chicago and Albany, both old boats, built in 1885 and 1897, were on the coast and in commission. There were a few destroyers and torpedo boats.

In Central American waters was stationed the gunboat Yorktown, while on the Asiatic side of the Pacific, a most important station, was an armored-cruiser squadron consisting of four vessels of the California class, the Colorado, Maryland, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia. There were, in addition, the protected cruisers Cincinnati and Raleigh, built sixteen years ago, and the Denver, Chattanooga, and Galveston, and a few old monitors and ten gunboats. Three of these gunboats were quite modern, but the seven captured from Spain are out of date. The gunboat Annapolis was stationed at Samoa.

To recapitulate, then, our fighting strength in the Pacific Ocean on the 4th day of July, when announcement was made of the projected cruise which called forth the bitter opposition to which I have referred, consisted of not a single battle ship, our naval force being represented by six armored cruisers of the California class, three semiarmored cruisers of the Charleston class, eight small protected cruisers from 11 to 16 years of age, four modern gunboats, four destroyers, and three torpedo boats.

The Secretary of the Navy is powerless to permanently assign a formidable fleet to Pacific waters if Congress fails to supply the ships.

The entire world, Mr. Chairman, now acknowledges the wisdom and far-sightedness of President Roosevelt and Secretary Metcalf in planning this remarkable and epoch-making cruise, the greatest in the history of this country, a cruise which is placing the American Navy on a high level in the world's opinion. As the mighty fleet of sixteen battle ships, the departure of which from Hampton Roads it was my privilege to witness, steamed down the coast of Central and South America the inhabitants of the commonwealths of Latin America were most profoundly impressed, awakening to a new realization of the tremendous power which insures the maintenance and enforcement of the Monroe doctrine, which only the actual sight of the the mighty and formidable armada could have awakened. What is actually seen is never forgotten. The spectacle will exert a powerful and lasting influence upon these people, inspiring respect for a flag that is too infrequently seen in Central and South American waters owing to the decline of our merchant marine. The emblems of European nations, which are alive to the importance of foreign markets, are far more familiar to our southern neighbors than the Stars and Stripes.

As the fleet passed through the hazardous Straits of Magellan there was brought home to every American citizen a full appreciation of the tremendous importance of the speedy completion of the great Panama Canal. Had this mighty interoceanic waterway been completed the sixteen battle ships could have made the trip from Hampton Roads to San Francisco in twenty-seven days, and it would have been necessary to replenish the coal supply but once. The distance via the canal is approximately 5,258 miles, as against about 13,782 miles through the Straits of Magellan—a saving of 8,524 miles.

When the battle ship Oregon made the famous run from San Francisco to join the Atlantic fleet in Cuban waters during the Spanish-American war, the people of California and of the entire country followed the movements of the San Francisco built ship with almost breathless anxiety, the significance of the elements of time and distance entering into the transfer of a fleet from coast to coast being brought home with telling effect.

Every thoughtful American citizen must admit that the Pacific Ocean is the great stage upon which the world's chief drama is to be played in the future, and as the Atlantic fleet headed northward after safely threading its way through the straits a new era in the history of this country began. All eyes are now turned irresistibly westward, the present center of world interest, as the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs so eloquently stated a few moments ago. With the fleet where it is to-day, the mastery of the Pacific is settled. So apparent is this fact that there is a growing demand, and one that is rapidly becoming insistent, that a strong fleet be permanently maintained in Pacific waters. [Applause.]

Every competent naval expert maintains that there should be two effective units of the navy—one in each ocean. If our present naval force will not permit of this, then the country should demand, and the Pacific coast in particular, that the necessary increase be made. The President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, declares that in his opinion four new battle ships are necessary at this time, appreciating as he does the growing importance of the Pacific. Believing that it is safe to follow the lead of President Roosevelt in this important matter, I shall therefore cast my vote for four battle ships. With the weight of our naval power on the Pacific we are insuring peace. You can no longer neglect the Pacific coast, for such neglect imperils the commercial interests of America. Unconsciously, perhaps, but nevertheless irresistibly, we are being drawn into the very vortex of the Far Eastern question. Maintain a strong fleet in a locality that experts declare to be most vulnerable. The Pacific coast is our door to China, Japan, Australia, the South Seas, the west coast of South and Central America, Alaska, and Mexico. In the development of China the world generally acknowledges that industrially and geographically the United States is in a position to take full advantage of the tremendous opportunities offered.

The Pacific coast is lacking in proper defenses. In a message sent to the Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, by President Roosevelt, he urged in the following language the increasing importance of proper coast defenses:

> The necessity for a complete and adequate system of coast defense is greater to-day than twenty years ago, for the increased wealth of the country offers more tempting inducements to attack and a hostile fleet can reach our coast in a much shorter period of time. The fact that we now have a Navy does not in any way diminish the importance of coast defenses; on the contrary, that fact emphasizes their value and the necessity for their construction. It is an accepted naval maxim that a navy can be used to strategic advantage only when acting on the offensive, and it can be free to so operate only after our coast defense is reasonably secure and so recognized by the country. It was due to the securely defended condition of the Japanese ports that the Japanese fleet was free to seek out and watch its proper objective—the Russian fleet—without fear of interruption or recall to guard its home ports against raids by the Vladivostok squadron. This, one of the most valuable lessons of the late war in the East, is worthy of serious consideration by our country, with its extensive coast line, its many important harbors, and its many wealthy manufacturing coast cities. The security and protection of our interests require the completion of the defenses of our coast.

San Francisco, however, is fast becoming one of the strongest fortified cities in the country. There are defenses at the mouth of the Columbia, at Puget Sound, and San Diego, but except at the places named an enemy could land with little difficulty. San Pedro Harbor, in southern California, is exposed, and the Representatives in Congress from that section of the State are urging that this important point be fortified. The Representatives from the State of Washington justly complain of the inadequacy of the Puget Sound defenses. Alaska and Hawaii, detached Territories, are at the mercy of a hostile fleet. It is to the lasting credit of this House that by a vote of 246 to 1, we, on Monday of this week, passed the following bill providing for a naval station at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, and making immediately available the sum of $650,000, which bill was unanimously reported by the House Committee on Naval Affairs:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to establish a naval station at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, on the site heretofore acquired for that purpose; and to erect thereat all the necessary machine shops, storehouses, coal sheds, and other necessary buildings, at an aggregate cost of not to exceed $500,000, and to build thereat one graving dry dock capable of receiving the largest war vessels of the Navy, at a cost not to exceed $2,000,000.
> SEC. 2. That the sums hereinafter stated are hereby appropriated and made immediately available, to be expended at the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, to wit: Toward dredging an entrance channel of a depth of 35 feet, $200,000; toward construction of dry dock, $300,000; toward erecting machine shops, storehouses, coal sheds, and other necessary buildings, $100,000; toward yard development, $50,000; in all, $650,000.
> SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Navy may, in his discretion, enter into contracts for any portion of the work, including material therefor, within the respective limits of cost herein stipulated, subject to appropriations to be made therefor by Congress.

The isolated Philippines, with their undeveloped wealth, are also inadequately protected, although progress is gradually being made looking to a proper safeguarding of these insular possessions, neglect of which jeopardizes the peace of the Far East. The Atlantic and Gulf coasts are dotted with large repair stations located at Portsmouth, N. H.; Boston, Mass.; Philadelphia (League Island); New York; Norfolk, Va.; Pensacola, Fla.; New Orleans, La., and Charleston, S. C.

On the Pacific coast we have but two repair stations, located at Mare Island, California, and on Puget Sound, Washington. The Mare Island Navy-Yard was established in 1852, and for nearly fifty years has done practically all the repair work on the Pacific coast for the Navy and also much for the transports of the Army. Strategically there is no yard in the country better located, protected as it is from attack by a hostile fleet. It is generally admitted that the Mare Island Navy-Yard is the second best equipped yard in the country and capable of building almost any character of ship. There is now in course of construction in that yard the 16-knot fleet collier Prometheus, rapid and most satisfactory progress being made on this vessel. Mare Island Navy-Yard has been attacked in some quarters because it has been necessary, owing to the increasing draft of naval vessels, to do considerable dredging in the channel leading to the yard. Part of the dredging would be required for the needs of commerce if there was no navy-yard at the present location. In this connection I would like to call attention to the fact that there is not a navy-yard in the country where money has not been spent, and in many it is still being expended, to maintain a sufficient channel depth, as evidenced by the following statement from the Navy Department:

Statement showing amounts spent for dredging at the various navy-yards from the date of their establishment up to the present time:

Boston	$152,501.34
Charleston	108,000.00
Guam	17,500.00
Guantanamo	40,000.00
Key West	101,000.00
League Island	984,159.26
Mare Island	500,699.96
New Orleans	9,225.73
New York	408,561.92
Norfolk	122,658.67
Olongapo	55,500.00
Pensacola	70,000.00
Port Royal	266,000.00
Portsmouth	774,000.00
Puget Sound	50,000.00
San Juan	2,000.00
Washington	25,349.00

From this statement it can be readily seen that in a number of the navy-yards larger sums have been and are still being expended than required for Mare Island, and yet Mare Island is continually being criticised, while expenditures at Eastern yards for like purposes are never referred to. Nearly $17,000,000 have been invested at Mare Island. The yard has done and is still doing splendid construction and repair work. The climate is most equable all the year. The idea of abandoning the yard is preposterous, and not worthy of even serious consideration.

The draft of battle ships has been so rapidly increasing during recent years that there are now many ports throughout the United States that they can not enter with safety, as recently pointed out by the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] in a speech in the United States Senate on February 21 of this year. Our battle ships draw from 26 to 28 feet of water. The harbor of Portland, Me., has 30 feet of water; Boston, 27; New York, 35; Philadelphia, 23; Baltimore, 30; Norfolk, 28; Savannah, 22; Charleston, 26; Key West, 26; Mobile, 23; New Orleans, 28; Galveston, 27; San Diego, 27½; San Francisco, 33, and Portland, Oreg., about 19 or 20 feet.

With this great awakening in the Pacific, carrying with it the fortification of our home coast and insular possessions, the crying need of a merchant marine equal to that of other nations competing with us for the trade of the Pacific should appeal to every thoughtful American citizen. The knowledge that the coal supplying our fleet has been carried in foreign bottoms brings the question to our attention with mighty force. Each year this question will grow in importance.

This cruise of the battle ships, the greatest in history, is not as yet completed. Twenty-three thousand miles will be covered, according to estimates, after leaving San Francisco. In all, over 37,000 miles will be the record when anchor is finally cast on the fleet's arrival on the Atlantic coast in February, 1909.

England, Australia, Japan, and China have extended invitations to the fleet, and these marked evidences of friendship are of great diplomatic significance. In the Orient our prestige will be vastly increased by the display of fighting ships.

The cordiality of Japan will grow more marked as the fleet approaches the Far East. The visit to Japanese ports under such happy circumstances will lead to a better understanding between the two nations, and the announcement of the acceptance of Japan's invitation has already silenced the last note of opposition to the cruise and taken from the jingo press its last round of ammunition. The cruise was happily conceived by the President and Secretary of the Navy, and its success is proving greater even than they anticipated.

The people of the Pacific coast welcome the fleet, and they ask and insist—and their request is but reasonable—that there be permanently assigned to the far western seaboard of this great nation a fleet of battle ships commensurate with the growing importance of the Pacific. [Loud applause.]

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT], I will yield seven minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN].

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Chairman, more than forty years have elapsed since the remnants of two great armies met for the last time at Appomattox. Whatever prejudice, whatever bitterness, whatever injustice survived this parting found no lasting place in the hearts of those who had borne the brunt of battle. In the shallow graves of those who did not live to see the dawn of peace blue and gray slept side by side, as do children of the same mother. Honor and valor had exacted the sacrifice, and the true soldier, North and South, standing over these graves, grounded his arms and said, "It is enough."

If those who saved the Union in fact by offering their lives for its existence had also been intrusted with the Government's policy of reconstruction, the legislation that I am going to ask for and that I have proposed in a bill—H. R. 19747—would have been unnecessary. The bill to which I refer is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 19747) to provide for refunding to lawful claimants the proceeds of the cotton tax unlawfully collected.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall, immediately upon the passage and approval of this act, compile a statement showing the amount of money illegally collected by the United States Government on account of the tax on cotton for the years 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868, respectively, in the several States, and showing, if possible, the persons, firms, or corporations paying the same, with the amounts so paid, which statement, when properly certified as to its correctness, shall be filed with the clerk of the Court of Claims and a duplicate thereof filed with the Treasurer of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the Court of Claims is hereby clothed with full and complete authority and jurisdiction to hear, try, and adjudicate all claims made under this act by persons, firms, or corporations, or their lawful heirs or representatives, claiming to have paid such tax for any or for all the years herein stated, and when said Court of Claims shall have adjudged a claim just and lawfully made, in the name of the proper party or parties, it shall approve the same, and the clerk of said Court of Claims shall certify said approval and transmit the approved claim to the Treasurer of the United States, who shall pay the same.

SEC. 3. That a sum sufficient to cover the total amount of cotton tax collected, as shown by the statement of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the same shall be available for the payment of all approved claims for the refund of said cotton tax, claimants to have five years in which to present and establish their claims, and the unexpended balance accredited to each State, after all approved claims have been paid and pending claims deducted, shall be paid to the treasurer of that State, to be used as a public school fund.

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect immediately upon its passage and approval by the President.

I refer to the refunding of the cotton taxes illegally collected, mainly from the Southern States.

That this tax was illegal, that it was unjust, from whatever standpoint viewed, there is not a shadow of doubt. In the only case brought before the Supreme Court of the United States the eight judges sitting were divided, four and four. Leading men who have stood in line of battle in the Union Army, notably, Hon. Charles H. Grosvenor, whose ability we all know, whose zeal as a Federalist is unquestioned, whose judgment is worthy of the highest respect, freely state that this tax was wrong, illegal, and unconstitutional. This legislative body admitted its error by repealing the act after 1868, even in the midst of most hostile legislation against the South.

If the act of Congress could have been justified on any possible ground, the spirit of the Federal Government then prevalent would have kept that act on the statutes until the last farthing of the expense incurred in the civil war had been paid. This was nothing more than an indirect effort to exact war indemnity. The quarrel with the South could not be justified, except on the ground of farsighted expediency. From the Northern point of view, the Southern States did not accomplish their withdrawal from the Union, and hence they were necessarily clothed with the same power, entitled to the same privileges, and free from the same exemptions as were all other States. If the Southern States were out of the Union, then they were not amenable to the Constitution. If they were actually, or even technically, at all times a part of the Union, then they were entitled to that fair and indiscriminate treatment that is guaranteed under the Constitution. It was apparent, even to the South's bitterest enemies in Congress at the time, that the cotton tax was unconstitutional, without the semblance of legal justification, and so the acts were repealed.

Can a Government so powerful, so wealthy, so generous in its dealings with dependent subjects in far away islands, refuse to restore to its own citizens that which has been taken in violation of the Constitution? It is estimated that our efforts at subjugation, education, and assimilation in our oriental possessions have cost this Government something like $800,000,000. To refund this cotton tax would require something like $68,000,000. Should we not be a little just before we are so very generous?

If there was no just ground for continuing the cotton tax, if there was even doubt of the legality of the tax, was not the money collected prior to the repeal of the act too questionable to be appropriated finally by a just and powerful nation? May we not hope that justice has been retarded not because of smoldering sectionalism, but because of lack of knowledge of the facts?

Such exhaustive and conclusive arguments have been advanced in recent speeches before this body, proving the illegality of the cotton tax, that I shall not enter extensively into this phase of the subject. But I hope that in the brief review that I shall make of the law and the facts the legislative conscience will be awakened.

All that is contained in the Constitution giving Congress the right to tax is found in the following provisions:

1. Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, etc.
2. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.
3. No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census of enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken.
4. No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State.

Taxes may be divided into two general classes—direct and indirect. Indirect taxes are the duties levied on imports which the consumer pays in buying the imported article.

The best, and yet a most erroneous contention, undertaking to justify this cotton tax, may be found in a letter of Hon. Israel Kimball, once Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in which he alleged that it was an indirect tax, and that it was paid by the consumer. This would be partly true, if the cotton producer fixed the price of his product and could add the tax to the selling price.

But who does not know that the price of cotton is fixed in New York and Liverpool regardless of the producer? Besides, at that time there was no duty on any kind of cotton imported into this country, and the domestic article could not be sold higher than the imported article free of duty. Any attempt to justify the cotton tax on the ground that it was indirect, and hence not paid by the producer, is too absurd to admit of serious argument. But suppose, for sake of argument, that this was an indirect tax, does it conform to that clause of the Constitution which provides:

That all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Under the acts levying taxes on cotton for the years mentioned in my bill South Carolina paid $4,172,420.16, while Connecticut paid $193.64 and Delaware paid nothing. It is a well-known fact that climatic conditions confine the raising of cotton to a section of the United States. Congress knew that a tax on all the crops of the Southern States would have been too palpably unconstitutional to receive the sanction of a majority vote, even of biased reconstructionists, and so, by a little legislative circumvention, it was sought to give validity to a clearly unconstitutional act. It was sought to give the acts the appearance of general application by using the following language:

There shall be paid by the producer, owner, or holder upon all cotton produced within the United States, etc.

Suppose a bill were proposed here levying a heavy tax on all sugar, hemp, wheat, or corn—that is to say, on any one of these articles exclusively raised in the United States. Would there not be a howl from the sections raising this article against such unjust discrimination? While these products are confined to certain sections of country, no one of them is so circumscribed as cotton. Cotton is not and can not be raised uniformly throughout the United States, and hence as an indirect tax it can not conform to the main requirement—that it shall be "uniform throughout the United States."

The fact is, the tax on cotton was a direct tax. Let us see what a direct tax is defined to be. Perry, on political economy, uses the following language:

A direct tax is levied on the very persons who are themselves expected to pay it.

The fact is, the producer did actually pay the cotton tax.

An excise is one form of direct tax, and under this specific head the cotton tax properly belonged, if it had been legally levied. Judge Story says:

An excise is an inland imposition or duty; a duty or tax laid on certain articles produced or consumed at home.

Here was an article produced and largely consumed at home. It was properly subject to an excise, if levied in accordance with the Constitution. But hear again the language of the Constitution:

All duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

That is, they shall fall with impartiality on Maine and Texas alike. Does a tax on cotton come within the requirements?

Again the Constitution says:

No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census.

By the census of 1860 the total population of the United States was 31,445,089, and of the eleven cotton States 9,103,333. The total cotton tax collected amounted to $68,072,388.99. Of this amount, eleven cotton States paid $64,701,352.76. Georgia paid over $11,000,000 and Maine paid nothing. How is this for laying the tax in conformity to the Constitution:

In proportion to the census or enumeration.

Again, in the language of the Constitution:

No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State.

At the time of the collection of the cotton taxes more than half of the entire crop was exported abroad. A strict definition of the word "export" includes shipment from one State to another. In this sense more than four-fifths of the entire crop was exported. Nothing could be clearer than that the cotton tax was, in this respect, violative of the Constitution.

There are some who do not pretend to justify the cotton tax from a legal or constitutional standpoint, but claim that it was a war measure and that the country was justified in suspending the Constitution. While this is the only honest contention that can be set up, it certainly could not be applicable to the taxes collected in 1867 and 1868, amounting to three-fourths of the entire collections, when peace reigned throughout the land. As for the taxes collected during the war, they may have been justified by the rule of might, but not by the rule of right. An army may be justified in confiscating or destroying property, as a legitimate war measure; but that a rich, proud, and powerful government will defy its own prescribed rule of conduct, to tax, under the guise of law, a poor and bleeding people, I refuse to believe.

If, blinded by prejudice and exasperated by the resistance that had for so long set at naught the Federal forces, the Government did in haste that which was unwarranted under the Constitution, has not the day of restitution come?

Perhaps few of the original taxpayers are living to enter their claims. The descendants, in many instances, could establish just claims, and any unclaimed amount might be turned over to the various State treasurers, for use in the common school fund.

This appeal is to the mind, after the passions have subsided. It is not made in the name of charity, nor yet is it a demand, but plainly and unequivocally it is a call to the performance of a duty, which if longer neglected must reflect upon the honesty of the nation. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

RECESS.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, under the order of the House the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union will stand in recess until 11.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. KAHN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 16757) for the incorporation of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1418), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 13844) to authorize and require the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company to maintain and operate a track connection with the United States navy-yard in the city of Washington, D. C., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1419), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RYAN, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the resolution of the House

(H. Res. 328) directing the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to transmit to the House information as to prices of meat products monthly during the last two years, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1420), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to which was referred the bills of the House H. R. 14013, 12660, 15249, 9130, and 17704, reported in lieu thereof a bill (H. R. 20591) for the appropriation of moneys from the sale of public lands for the establishment and maintenance of schools or departments of instruction in mines and mining in the various States and Territories, accompanied by a report (No. 1421), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20122) granting an increase of pension to Charles Heywood, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. LANGLEY: A bill (H. R. 20582) to amend an act entitled "An act in amendment of sections 2 and 3 of an act entitled 'An act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents,' approved May 9, 1900"—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES: A bill (H. R. 20583) providing for the improvement and repairs to the court-house and post-office building at Paducah, Ky.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 20584) to amend the act approved July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against any unlawful restraints and monopolies"—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. McGUIRE: A bill (H. R. 20585) for the payment of outstanding warrants against moneys belonging to the Chickasaw Nation for certain purposes—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. GARNER: A bill (H. R. 20586) authorizing Samuel W. Fordyce and others to construct a bridge across the Rio Grande at some point at or near the town of Brownsville, in Cameron County, Tex.—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. SULZER: A bill (H. R. 20587) to establish a Department of Labor—to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. LITTLEFIELD: A bill (H. R. 20588) to provide for the payment of water powers and water rights—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. JONES of Virginia: A bill (H. R. 20589) to provide for the construction of a light-vessel for Winter Quarter Shoal Station, seacoast of Virginia—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. LOUDENSLAGER: A bill (H. R. 20590) to increase the pensions of widows of soldiers and sailors of the late civil war, the war with Mexico, the various Indian wars, and so forth, and to grant pensions to certain widows of such soldiers and sailors—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FOSTER of Illinois, from the Committee on Mines and Mining: A bill (H. R. 20591) for the appropriation of moneys from the sale of public lands for the establishment and maintenance of schools or departments of instruction in mines and mining in the various States and Territories—to the Union Calendar.

By Mr. CONNER: A bill (H. R. 20592) to extend the provisions of the act of June 27, 1902, entitled "An act to extend the provisions, limitations, and benefits of an act entitled 'An act granting pensions to the survivors of the Indian wars of 1832 to 1842, inclusive, known as the Black Hawk war, Cherokee disturbance, and the Seminole war,' approved July 27, 1892."—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. STEPHENS of Texas: Resolution (H. Res. 334) asking why certain Indians are now being imprisoned in Arizona by order of the Interior Department—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. CARTER: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 165) for the enrollment of certain persons as members of the Osage tribe of Indians, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills nad resolutions of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia: A bill (H. R. 20593) for the relief of Alberti Operti—to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. BENNETT of Kentucky: A bill (H. R. 20594) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth Wall—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20595) granting a pension to Lee Ison—to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20596) granting an increase of pension to Joseph H. Davis—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20597) granting an increase of pension to Richard M. J. Jones—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20598) granting an inrcease of pension to Perry Kains—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20599) for the relief of Harriett Ann Crank—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20600) for the relief of James H. C. Mann—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20601) granting an increase of pension to John T. Dean—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20602) for the relief of H. P. Elderman—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20603) granting an increase of pension to John M. Gardner—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20604) granting a pension to Edward Shields—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20605) for the relief of G. W. Darnell—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20606) granting an increase of pension to William T. Tomlin—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20607) granting an increase of pension to John P. Huff—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20608) granting an increase of pension to Rebecca A. Gallup—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20609) for the relief of Jeremiah Hunt—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20610) granting an increase of pension to James K. Jackson—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20611) granting an increase of pension to Clabon W. Stiltner—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20612) granting an increase of pension to William H. Ryder—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BIRDSALL: A bill (H. R. 20613) to compensate C. W. Smith for services and disbursements made in the war with Spain—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20614) granting an increase of pension to Alvin Eck—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BURLEIGH: A bill (H. R. 20615) for the relief of Charles P. Ryan—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CARTER: A bill (H. R. 20616) granting an increase of pensions to James Ousley—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also (by request), a bill (H. R. 20617) to protect the rights of Jack Risner, an intermarried Choctaw citizen—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also (by request), a bill (H. R. 20618) to protect the rights of Laura Stewart, a Choctaw citizen by blood—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. CRAIG: A bill (H. R. 20619) for the relief of the heirs of Jesse Glawson, deceased—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. DENBY: A bill (H. R. 20620) for the relief of Theodore E. Rollett—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. EDWARDS of Kentucky: A bill (H. R. 20621) granting an increase of pension to John H. Hail—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FLOYD: A bill (H. R. 20622) for the relief of James H. Gaines—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. FOSTER of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 20623) granting a pension to Garet Williamson—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20624) granting an increase of pension to William J. Chandler—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20625) granting a pension to Lawrence Lane—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20626) granting a pension to Elie Gaston—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20627) granting an increase of pension to Andrew Reibel—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FULLER: A bill (H. R. 20628) granting an increase of pension to Edward R. Blain—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey: A bill (H. R. 20629) granting an increase of pension to Edward C. Reed—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HAWLEY: A bill (H. R. 20630) granting an increase of pension to Barzilla Greenwood—to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20631) granting a pension to Daniel R. Cone—to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20632) granting an increase of pension to John E. Smith—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20633) granting a pension to William B. Gilpin—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20634) granting an increase of pension to Eleanor McDevitt—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20635) to correct the military record of Charles W. Becker—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Burt and 32 others, residents of Potter County; Albert Dunning and 24 others, residents of Tioga County, and A. B. Wheeler and 14 others, residents of Tioga County, all in the State of Pennsylvania, for S. 3152, for additional protection to dairy interests—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petition of David Wurster and 18 others, residents of Lycoming County, Pa., for a national highways commission and for Federal aid in road construction (H. R. 15837)—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. YOUNG: Petition of sundry citizens of Michigan, for amendment of the Sherman antitrust laws—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 11, 1908.

[Continuation of the legislative day of Monday, April 6, 1908.]

The recess having expired, the committee, at 11 o'clock and 30 minutes a. m., was called to order by the Chairman, Mr. MANN.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the condition of the time of both sides.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has consumed two hours and fifty-four minutes and the gentleman from Tennessee two hours and ten minutes.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, then I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to go ahead.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I now yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GREGG].

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, the upbuliding of our Navy, like providing all means of national defense, should be, and I believe is, absolutely nonpartisan. There are men on that side of the House and there are men on this side of the House, level-headed, well-balanced men, who do not oppose a navy, but who believe that the naval appropriations should be kept within reasonable limits. [Applause.] They believe that the naval appropriations should not bear any unfair or unjust proportion to the sums of money needed and appropriated to the other branches of the Government. On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, there are gentlemen upon that side and there are gentlemen upon this side who seem to be navy mad. Their thought by day is of much navy, and their dream by night is of more navy. They seem to have no care for the efficient administration of any other branch of the public service. If permitted to have their way, they would cripple the other needs of the Government in order to expend on the Navy more than its just proportion of the nation's revenue.

They would cut short the improvement of our waterways and of our harbors. We are to have no river and harbor bill this year because we have not sufficient funds, but I hear no suggestion from the Navy enthusiasts to in any way economize on the Navy. On the contrary, they are making an effort to increase the appropriation beyond what the Committee on Naval Affairs after careful consideration has determined upon.

They would postpone the completion of our coast defenses.

The War Department this year recommended $38,000,000 for the erection of needed fortifications. The Committee on Appropriations, because of the condition of our finances, appropriated only about $8,000,000. Yet there are men on this floor who want to use twenty millions of that necessary saving in the building of two battle ships more than the number recommended by the Committee on Naval Affairs. They would postpone the erection of public buildings needed by the Government for the proper conduct of its business, and would deny to the underpaid Government employee an increase in salary in order that they may the more rapidly expand the naval establishment. Those of you who have in your districts rivers and harbors which are left unimproved, and who need public buildings which will not be provided for, will be in a pitiable condition before your constituents if you vote all the money to carry out an extravagant naval programme. What will the American people say of the Congress if after raising our own salaries we refuse to raise the salaries of equally as just employees of the Government, where the necessity is just as great, on the ground that we have not the money, when they learn that we waste money on an extravagant naval programme? Those who favor this programme either do not realize that there is a limit to the nation's revenues or they are absolutely indifferent as to other needs of the Government. To such a programme or policy I am unalterably opposed, and would oppose it just as vigorously if recommended by a Democratic Administration as I do when recommended by a Republican Administration. With me it is a question of rational, proper, public policy; it is not a question of partisan politics. [Applause.]

I believe first in providing such coast and harbor defense as will absolutely insure that no hostile force will ever put foot on our shores. With this provided there will, in time of war, be no demand for the Navy to furnish coast protection. Our ships can go out to sea to meet the enemy, and needing none for coast defenses and being able to send our entire fleet where the emergencies demand it, we can do with fewer ships. I believe also in maintaining an army sufficient as a nucleus, and a large, well-trained, equipped, and efficient militia, which in time of trouble can come to the relief of our standing Army while we are mobilizing the volunteers who have always been and who aways will be the bulwark of our defense. These are matters of defense, and I believe in providing them before we provide means of aggression and offense. I believe in a reasonable navy, such a navy as will protect us against dangers reasonably to be expected, while we go ahead attending to our own business, doing justice to and expecting nothing but justice of all other nations on the earth. But I do not believe in building a navy for the purpose of encouraging and engendering a jingo and bullying spirit. [Applause.] I believe that a nation, like a man, will sometimes get into trouble while trying to avoid it. I am firmly convinced that a nation, like a man, when seeking trouble will be sure always to find it. [Applause.]

Every State in this Union has a law prohibiting the carrying of arms. This is based on the theory that men who go unarmed will avoid trouble which they might not seek to avoid if they go armed. [Applause.] Now, is it not a little strange that as to individuals we enact laws upon the theory that a man when unarmed will avoid trouble, but contend that the way for a nation to avoid trouble is to go with the biggest armament in the world? [Applause.] Scorning the idea of building a navy for purposes of offense and regarding it only as a means of defense, I believe that our present Navy is in units sufficient, and that we need only to maintain the present number of units. Now, I have some pretty good authority on that proposition. In his message to the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress the President said:

> It does not seem to me necessary, however, that the Navy should be, at least in the immediate future, increased beyond the present number of units. What is now clearly necessary is to substitute efficient for inefficient units as the latter become worn out, or as it becomes apparent that they are useless.
> Probably the result would be obtained by adding a single battle ship each year.

Again, in his message to the second session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, on December 3, 1906, he said:

> I do not ask that we continue to increase our Navy. I ask merely that it be maintained at its present strength, and this can be done if we replace the obsolete and outworn ships by new and good ones, the equal of any afloat in any navy.

He then proceeds to mention some ships in our Navy which he considers obsolete and outworn, and then he adds:

All these ships should be replaced by others, and this can be done by a well-settled programme of providing for the building each year of at least one first-class battle ship, equal in size and speed to any that any nation is at the same time building.

We took his advice and adopted a well-settled programme of providing for the building each year of a first-class battle ship, equal in size and speed to any which any nation was at the same time building, and I believe in that. Whenever we build a battle ship, build it the equal of anything that any other nation is even contemplating putting upon the waters. [Applause.] But, lo, presto change! We had hardly got settled to this well-settled programme until he unsettles himself and seeks to unsettle us and to unsettle our well-settled programme. This year, without any apparent reason for his change of mind, he recommends the building of four battle ships, and if the same ratio of increase continues next year, we will have to be building sixteen, and if reports are true, he is using the power of his Administration to force upon us this new unsettled programme. I say there is no apparent reason for this change of mind or change of policy. If attempted to be justified on the ground that there is danger of conflict with Japan, I answer that the relations between the United States and Japan were much more acute and much more strained on December 3, 1906, when he said that one battle ship was enough, than they were in December, 1907, when he asked for four. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If attempted to be justified on the ground that the fleet has been sent to the Pacific and there is no fleet upon the Atlantic, I answer that if we have trouble with Japan it will be upon the Pacific and not upon the Atlantic, and we will need our fleet there and will not need it in the East. But it has been recently determined that the fleet shall be returned to the Atlantic. This, to my mind, is proof conclusive that the Administration does not now, if it ever did, anticipate any trouble with Japan.

I went on the Committee on Naval Affairs in the Fifty-ninth Congress. During that Congress naval officers came before us, and, with closed doors and transoms down for fear a passer-by might overhear, we were told of the danger of war with Germany. This year they come to us and they whisper to us that they were mistaken about Germany, but it is Japan sure this time, and I fear that when this error is dispelled by time, like the error about Germany was, there will be some other nation ready to jump on us. I for one am becoming tired of such tactics. They are an insult to the intelligence of the committee. They are a fraud upon Congress and a fraud upon the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] All suggestions of danger of war with Japan beget in me an absolute pity for the suggester. I read recently a certain article written from Tokyo on February 20, 1908, by a correspondent of a number of American newspapers, and it states the position so well that I will simply read an extract from the article.

This was written on February 20, 1908, from Japan:

A critical examination of Japan's national resources and present financial status reveals such a sorry condition of affairs that even the suggestion of war with a power like the United States seems to be the height of absurdity. No matter how well Japan may be prepared for war in a military way, in other respects it is not at all prepared. Modern war means spending money, and in order to spend money one must have resources. Japan is poverty stricken and almost bankrupt. Its total wealth is but one-twentieth of that of the United States, although its population is more than half as great.

If every vestige of wealth in Japan could be turned into cash, the whole amount would not be enough to buy the clothing and furniture used by the people of the United States. The entire income of the Japanese Government is not as great as that of the United States Steel Corporation.

Now, those men who advocate the building of more battle ships than the two recommended by the committee forget that there is a limit to the resources even of this rich nation, and they also seem to forget the many other needs of the Navy, not to mention the needs of other Departments of the Government, and the large amounts of money necessary to supply those needs. I will mention a few of these needs of the Navy. We have not the facilities for docking the large vessels of the Delaware class that we are now building. This will require many millions of dollars. We need navy-yards and naval stations on the Pacific, in Hawaii, and in our insular possessions. These will require many more millions of dollars.

The conduct of our navy-yards has been upon the most unbusinesslike basis. Each bureau of the Navy has had its own separate power plant, its own separate machine shop, and its own separate establishment of every kind. This has entailed unnecessary expense. The present Assistant Secretary of the Navy, encouraged by bills introduced in Congress and by suggestions from the Committee on Naval Affairs, has undertaken a system of consolidation by which we will consolidate all the power plants into one, all the different machine shops into one, and all the duplicated establishments into one establishment. This will require many more millions of dollars. But its expenditure will be wise, because the net saving to the Government will justify it. Then, the Gun Factory at Washington needs millions of dollars to so equip it that we can make there the guns and other armament needed for our ships at reasonable cost and within reasonable time. The present annual fixed expenses of the Navy for salaries of officers and of enlisted men and for general administration is $100,000,000. This is exclusive of any increase. Each battle ship adds increases to this fixed annual expense of about $1,000,000.

Now, there is another thing I want to call attention to. The Secretary of the Navy told us in his hearings this year that to equip and properly officer the ships that we now have and that we are now building we are 1,846 officers short. We are graduating annually at Annapolis from 180 to 200. Putting it at 200, making no allowances for death or retirement amongst our present officers, it will require nine years to graduate the officers necessary for the ships we now have. What excuse is there or what use is there in building more ships and putting them in reserve without officers, when by the time we have the officers ready for them they will become obsolete and of no practical use to the Government? [Applause.]

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREGG. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. In view of the shortage to which the gentleman has called attention, I would like to inquire what is being done now? Are ships tied up at the wharves because they can not be officered?

Mr. GREGG. Yes, sir; they put them in reserve, as they call it. Just lay them up.

Mr. SCOTT. Can the gentleman tell us how many and what ships are in reserve?

Mr. GREGG. I do not know the exact number, but those that they can not officer are placed in reserve, and the programme of these naval enthusiasts is to build more and put them in reserve and let them become obsolete before we have officers to put on them. And that is not all. We have not the men for them. We are short of men for crews and before we can find the men to equip these new ships that they are clamoring for they will have become obsolete.

Our Navy is now, in size, the second in the world—second only to that of England. I believe in maintaining this position, which can be done by a sane, conservative development each year, without any wild risks.

Ours is not only larger than any other navy except England's, but ship for ship and man for man our Navy is superior to that of any other on earth. This superiority added to our superior size gives us an ample margin of superiority. If we are not to be satisfied with maintaining our position of second, then there is only one other thing to do, and that is to enter into a wild scramble to surpass England.

Any other course is useless and extravagant. We are already superior to any nation but England. Now, then, every ship that we add to our Navy in the meantime which does not make us superior to England is useless as far as the other nations are concerned, and of no avail as far as England is concerned. So we are left the alternative of being satisfied to hold our present position, or enter into a wild scramble for superiority with England, and we know that before she will submit to that she will exhaust every resource within her power. We will enter into a wild scramble that will bankrupt both nations, and I trust that the American people, with nothing but pride to base it upon, will never enter upon such a mad, foolish scramble as that. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve what time I have left.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I now yield one hour to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON], a member of the committee.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, after the eloquent and illuminating speech of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, there is hardly need for making further reference to the body of the naval appropriation bill. I beg to call attention, however, to the fact that the large amount of money carried by that bill is due chiefly to the cost of administration and maintenance, and that the attack on the line of expenditure is chiefly directed to new construction. I here make the suggestion that those gentlemen who wish to attack that bill on the basis of the large amount of money should make their attack on the first part of the bill. Proportionately, the amount carried for new construction is very small. I realize that with the high standard in our Navy the cost of maintenance must always be greater than the relative cost abroad. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that it will be possible to make substantial economies in the cost of administration and maintenance, and I hope to have some part, if possible, in making such economies. There is a movement on the part of the Navy Department that gives promise of substantial returns in economy of administration.

But I beg to earnestly call attention to the fact that the new construction is the most vital part of the bill, and of the new construction the battle ships are the most vital items, not only because these realize the greatest economy in construction, in getting full return for every dollar expended, but also because the battle ship is the unit that determines and secures the purpose for which the Navy exists. In spite of superficial statements to the contrary, it is a fact based on human nature that to be prepared to resist attack tends to ward off attack. The American Navy is not only intended, as are all the other navies, to win the victory when war must come, but it is also intended to enable this nation to live in peace and tranquillity, without molestation from the military and aggressive nations of the world. [Applause.] And when any aggressive nation, with its chief of staff, investigates the question whether a war is to be undertaken or not, that nation does not ask about administration; it does not ask about maintenance; it does not ask about auxiliaries; it asks, How many battle ships has the other nation? [Applause.]

It is scarcely necessary to refer seriously to the remarks of gentlemen as to the effect of shortage in personnel upon the advisability of building more ships, after the chairman of the committee has distinctly pointed out that the present bill will carry 6,000 additional men, enough not only to man the four battle ships that are building, but enough to man the remaining four battle ships, if such are provided in this bill. To take the broad statement of the Secretary of the Navy as to the total number of officers and men required to man every ship in the Navy down to the last monitor, gunboat, yacht, and tug, and say because there are not enough that we ought to stop building battle ships is simply ridiculous.

Mr. FOSS. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment? The gentleman does not mean to state that I said that we provide in this bill for enough men to man the four battle ships for which I understand the gentleman proposes to make a motion in the House?

Mr. HOBSON. Not at all. I have said it is enough, with 800 men per ship, to man the four battle ships and practically four more, if we decide to have them built.

Mr. FOSS. I made the statement that we provide 6,000 men to man the ships already authorized; but it does not provide for ships that will be authorized by this bill.

Mr. HOBSON. I understand that perfectly.

Mr. FOSS. I want to make that clear.

Mr. HOBSON. A shortage of personnel does exist in the Navy, and it is due to the fact that we are not scientific in treating the question. Abroad, whenever a battle ship is authorized, the law carries automatically enough men to man the ship. We have neglected to do this in the past.

Mr. GREGG. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HOBSON. I have a two-hours speech and only one hour of time, but am glad to yield, though yesterday my requests for interruption were all refused.

Mr. GREGG. Does the gentleman know that we have not been able to supply the men required even for the number authorized?

Mr. HOBSON. The gentleman does not know anything of the kind. [Applause.] Recruiting has never been better in time of peace.

Mr. GREGG. Then the gentleman does not know the facts.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope to see this question of personnel treated in a scientific way in the future. Instead of advancing one delinquency, a shortage in men, as a reason for committing another delinquency in a shortage of ships, I hope to see ample provision made for both. At present officers are being added fast enough. The trouble lies in the congestion at the top and the bottom. Reorganization has not kept pace with expansion, and to-day our rear-admirals average less than two years in their grade before retirement, while in foreign services the average is from eight to eleven years. The need for reorganization has become imperative, and I hope to see the necessary legislation, if not at this session, then at the next session. As to the men, if we add 6,000 additional men a year, we shall have as many men as we need before any ship authorized in this bill is in commission.

Mr. Chairman, I am sure the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] does not wish that his very accurate statement, that the Naval Committee has given earnest consideration to the matters involved in this bill, should mislead the Congress. I therefore believe it is incumbent upon me to state that at least two-thirds of the Naval Committee, including the chairman, believe that we ought to authorize four battle ships this year instead of two. They voted to authorize only two simply because they thought we could not get more than two, and feared that recommending more would lessen the chances of getting the two. Their convictions are for four. The recommendation of two was a matter of policy and expediency.

Mr. Chairman, self-preservation is the first law of nature, whether it applies to a plant, to an animal, to a man, or a nation. Provision may be individual or collective. Men in organized communities have provided collectively for self-defense. Collective provision is infinitely preferable to the individual provision, not only because it is far more effective, but also because it relieves individuals from the more or less injurious task of going armed. Arbitration is infinitely preferable to armaments. But, Mr. Chairman, there must always be adequate provision for self-defense of one kind or the other. No form of life on this earth is left to the benevolence of other life for its preservation. It is wrong; it is flying in the face of the Almighty who created us to ask it to be otherwise. Therefore it simply remains, in providing for national defense, to determine whether adequate collective provision is attainable or whether, as a nation, we must depend upon our own national provision.

I submit that it is the fundamental duty of every man who loves his country, and every man who loves his kind, to use every effort in his power to further the cause of providing a system of collective preservation, of creating among the nations an organization anologous to that provided in civilized communities by which differences are settled by law based upon justice. I believe that we have begun a new era, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] yesterday pointed out. I believe we are already upon the path which is going to end in an international organization, where there will be adequate provision for securing the defense of individual nations, thus permitting individual nations to give up their individual armaments. I am glad to bear testimony to the fact that America has taken the leading part in the work as far as it has gone, and that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT], though too modest yesterday to mention the fact, himself penned the resolution of St. Louis, and it was the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] who introduced it, the resolution that brought forth the Second Hague Conference, the purpose of which was primarily to provide for periodical conferences at The Hague, to evolve ultimately into an international congress that would make laws for civilized nations to live under.

I am glad to bear testimony to the fact that it was likewise the American delegation and the gentleman from Missouri who had the chief part in the Inter-Parliamentary Union in laying the plank of the platform before the First Hague Conference that resulted in the establishment of the permanent tribunal of The Hague. I am glad to say that America is in the forefront of the peace movements of the world. But no one can deny the fact, which was stated yesterday by the gentleman from Missouri, that up to this point the provision has not been adequate. There is no police provided for out among the nations to protect us or any other nation. There is no adequate tribunal. The permanent tribunal of The Hague is a diplomatic rather than a judicial tribunal. It has no jurisdiction essentially its own, and even if it had, there is no power to bring offending nations to the bar. In fact, there is no international law which can be properly called law. It has not the force of the common law of England.

There is nothing behind it. Each nation interprets it to suit itself. There is no authorized body to-day to make laws for the world. The furthest progress that has thus far been made is to negotiate arbitration treaties between nations by pairs. The proposition of the American delegates at the last Hague conference to have a general mondial arbitration treaty, elastic and automatic, was rejected by the conference, and to-day the arbitration treaties that have just been negotiated between our country and other countries simply provide for what may be called minor questions. Every treaty now in existence between the great powers of the world specifically reserves and eliminates questions of independence, questions of honor, questions of vital interest, from the provision for arbitration. I ask what provision is going to be made for guaranteeing the honor, independence, and vital interests of our nation? They are eliminated from courts of arbitration. What other provision will you make for them? If provision is important for minor questions, it must be more important for vital questions. Vital questions being excluded from arbitration can have no other recourse but provision through armaments.

Let us do all we can to expand the area of arbitration. I hope this Congress will vitalize its group of the interparliamentary union by giving it official recognition and by providing funds for its use. I hope there will be provision for permanent representation at The Hague conferences and the Pan-American conferences. But after we have done our utmost let us not expect a century plant to bloom in a day, even in small communities. Trial by battle was in vogue for five hundred years after trial by jury was begun. Bear in mind that even to-day among the other great nations of the world honor is still settled by trial by duel. Bear in mind that even here, in the nation where organization for peace is developed to the highest degree yet attained within this generation, there took place between kindred States the greatest war the world ever witnessed.

My countrymen, do not let us be deceived. The question of self-preservation is too vital to be trifled with. Until long years after an international organization is created we must still rely upon ourselves. Until arbitration has been extended to all questions and has proven itself effective we must look to ourselves for national self-preservation. Upon what instrumentalities must we depend? Either armies or navies. Armies involve men in vast numbers, taking them from their work. Navies involve ships, leaving the men at work. Armies are in the midst of the people; navies are far away on the sea. Armies may tend to undermine the institutions of a country. No navy has ever usurped civil power or overturned a government since the world began. On the contrary, navies have been the cradle of liberty, protecting the citizens of a country in their peaceful pursuits and relieving them from the pursuit of arms.

For these reasons all nations of the earth have chosen naval power as far as conditions permitted. Here in America the conditions for naval power are ideal. By controlling the waters that lead to our shores our nation could realize a perfect security and our citizens could continue in tranquillity to work out their glorious destiny.

In provision for a navy, I submit that there should not only be adequate power to win the war, if it must come, but adequate power to prevent the war, if possible, and this means, my countrymen, that in the waters in question there should be a substantial margin of superiority. When navies seem to be about equal, the aggressive power believes in its own and it will take occasion to put it to a test.

I will give you an illustration. In the time of the war with Spain the two navies were estimated as just about equal. Each thought its navy was superior. War came. I do not hesitate to say that if we had had three or four more battle ships the margin of superiority would have enabled the troubles in the West Indies to be settled by diplomacy. Mark you, when you are determining between two battle ships and four, you are trifling with that small vital margin upon which peace and war will hinge, upon which the value of your whole Navy is at stake. Twenty millions of dollars put into battle ships a few years prior to 1898 and there would have been no war. When the war came our coast-line people were thrown into panic, and we spent $50,000,000, threw it away upon mosquito fleets of no use. The Spanish war has cost us in one way, directly and indirectly, about $1,400,000,000. Twenty-five million dollars put into battle ships in advance would have spared it all; and yet the total cost, including pensions, is counted up to the Navy and Army.

Now, let us examine in detail this question and, in a business-like way, establish a scientific basis and reach conclusions that are not matters of opinion, but conclusions that are as unchangeable as the laws of mathematics and the laws of nature.

Take the Atlantic Ocean. Around it are assembled the great maritime powers. Take the powers of Europe. Measuring along the indentations, Great Britain has 2,200 miles of coast line, France has 1,700 miles, Germany has 800 miles, making altogether about 4,700 miles for the three great maritime nations of Europe. Across the ocean America has in the Atlantic Ocean proper 5,400 miles of coast and in the Gulf 4,300 miles. Upon examination you will find that our country is accessible from the water through its entire area east of the Rocky Mountains. Through the St. Lawrence River and Canadian canals over 300 British vessels could pass to the Great Lakes, about which there are 4,700 more miles of coast line.

Up the Mississippi River and its tributaries and the other rivers leading up from the Atlantic waters there are over 15,000 miles of waterways. Do not scoff at the navigation of even inland rivers in time of war, if the enemy has control of the sea and has armies. The civil war will answer any such tendency to scoff. Adding Cuba, 7,000 miles of coast line, and Porto Rico, 500, we have over 35,000 miles of American coast line, compared with 4,700 miles for the three great maritime nations of Europe. But that does not end America's responsibility. We have assumed the Monroe doctrine; we propose to maintain it. Along the eastern coast of Mexico there are 1,700 miles and for Central America 1,500 miles, and on the east coast of South America 12,500 miles, making nearly 16,000 miles added by the Monroe doctrine, and making a total of nearly 50,000 miles for this nation to protect, as against 4,700 for the three principal maritime nations of Europe.

The great European centers have been built inland. America's great centers have been built on her waterways. On her Atlantic coast line alone there are 15,800,000 of American citizens living within gunshot of the water, with seventeen billions six hundred millions of property. On the Gulf there are 1,900,000 people and eight hundred millions of property. On the Great Lakes there are 7,000,000 of people and seven billions two hundred millions of property. On the Mississippi River and its navigable tributaries there are eleven and a half millions of people and eight billions six hundred millions of property. We are the most exposed nation on earth—36,000,000 of our people and thirty-seven billions of our property now lying within gunshot of the water, more citizens exposed than there are citizens exposed in all Europe combined, more property exposed than there is property in all the rest of the world combined.

If you have a trust company or valuables, do you not put a guard over them even in the most civilized community, with the best regulated police force? Would you, then, propose to leave all the vast national interests unguarded out in the world where there is no police, no law, no courts? Let us examine further. Coast fortifications are valuable, but they have never prevented a determined commander from running by. We ought to have coast defenses, but even on the plan laid out by the Board of National Defense, where we have expended eighty-four millions, there remains seventy millions yet to be expended—nearly half is unprovided for, and for the half already built we lack by more than 4,000 men enough to man the guns with half crews.

Of the twenty-seven fortified harbors only five have complete provision for fire control and only one-third have complete searchlight provision. We furthermore lack a mobile land force to protect the rear. No fort that ever existed could withstand an attack from the rear with mobile troops. We have no army that could be mobilized to prevent the seizure of these forts from the rear. We have altogether only 19,000 of Regulars; there are only 9,000 in the United States—less than the police of New York City—and they are scattered far and wide. We have 50,000 trained militia. The largest organization we have is the regiment. We have neither brigade nor division organization.

An expedition can leave Europe from any one of the great maritime powers with less than a hundred and fifty thousand men, and in three weeks that expedition can capture Washington City, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York without any possibility of substantial resistance. Furthermore, before we could assemble an army capable of expelling them from one city they could have done what they pleased with all that property and embark practically without loss. The expedition would destroy our shipyards, our navy-yards and arsenals and leave us impotent. We would have to start all over and build a new navy. How long would it take us? Perhaps ten years.

And at how much cost? Untold billions—then we would have to create a stupendous transport service and a great army, turning our citizens from their peaceful pursuits to the profession of arms. Then we would have to go across the ocean, where no base could be found and where a great army would resist any attempt to land. Without a ready army, without bases in Europe, without a merchant marine the United States could be raided without a chance for retaliation. We would win in the end, but at what a cost!

My countrymen, this should not be permitted to continue. As a simple matter of insurance, as a police proposition, America must have a navy capable of controlling the ocean in the Atlantic against any nation of Europe. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman permit a question? How many battle ships does the gentleman think we ought to have to defend our enormous coast lines?

Mr. HOBSON. I will state that. At the present juncture the British have forty-five battle ships and thirty-three armored cruisers available in the waters of the Atlantic, making seventy-eight. Germany has twenty-one battle ships and six armored cruisers, making twenty-seven in all. France has sixteen battle ships and fifteen armored cruisers, making thirty-one. America has three battle ships and two armored cruisers, making five.

As to the necessity of the future, the British have ten Dreadnought ships with their keels laid. She is laying down two more, and there are three Brazilian Dreadnoughts in England; the last two South American battle ships which were built were taken over by England—the Swiftsure and Hotspur. Adding those three Brazilian battle ships with the two she is laying down, she will have five available in addition to the ten now coming on fast. France has six laid down and six more projected, making twelve. Germany has five laid down and has authorized four for this year and four for next year and four for the following year, and so on to about 1917. If we would simply hold our present relative position, we will have to authorize six great battle ships this year and four more each subsequent year until further development.

Mr. RAINEY. How long would it take at this rate before developments occurred that would stop the building of four a year?

Mr. HOBSON. No one can foresee.

Mr. RAINEY. It might go to 200 or 300 battle ships according to the gentleman's position.

Mr. HOBSON. If the other nations built 200 each then we ought to build about 300. Now, please do not interrupt me in order to ask ridiculous questions. I do not yield, Mr. Chairman, for such questions.

Mr. RAINEY. How much will it cost to maintain these battle ships?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama declines to yield.

Mr. RAINEY. I thought he declined to yield to a ridiculous question and I am not asking ridiculous questions. [Applause.]

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, it is puerile for us to assume that we are not in any danger.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. How long, according to that programme, would it take to bankrupt the world?

Mr. HOBSON. Well, America controls seventeen billions of the world's banking capital, and the rest of the world controls seventeen billions. The other nations have large armies—we have not. It will bankrupt the rest of the world about 2,000 years before it would bankrupt America. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we have, as I say, laid down the Monroe doctrine. The Monroe doctrine lies 5,000 miles from our shores. Any man in earnest about the doctrine must realize that, to make it safe and secure against aggressions from Europe, we must be able to send a fleet there as large as any European power could send.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBSON. I am sorry I must decline to yield further.

Mr. Chairman, our form of government is peculiar. Within our borders the citizens of foreign nations have to be subjected to the same treatment as American citizens, and therefore are amenable in police cases to local State authority. No nation of the world has consented to that proposition. It has been challenged many times in the Atlantic, and last year it was challenged in the Pacific, and our Government could not guarantee to California security in exercising its constitutional rights. Now, with the fleet in the Pacific it can not guarantee the States of the Atlantic seaboard. In addition, we are the only nation in the world that stands for the equal rights of men. The great governing classes of other nations base their claims upon heredity. We can not assume for a moment that here, with the oceans now bridged with an infinite number of bridges leading from the armies of the monarchies of Europe, we can live in security unless we can control those bridges. The only rational basis for an enduring peace is for America to have control of the sea in the Atlantic. Four battle ships this year would not be sufficient for this.

They would not even maintain our present position relatively to Germany and France. Unless we quicken our pace we shall fall to fourth place.

But another ocean has come upon us. It is unseemly for preachers to send a memorial here to this Congress quoting the President two years ago and failing to quote him to-day, for them to assume that there are no more naval responsibilities to-day than there were two years ago. The fact that the President recommended only one ship two years ago shows that he is anxious to recommend the minimum. This year he has recommended four. Why? Another ocean has been added since two years ago. The Aleutian Islands and Alaska put 5,100 miles of coast line upon us, the Pacific coast 3,100 miles, the Hawaiian Islands 780, Samoa 85, Guam 80, the Philippine Islands 13,600, making 27,000 and odd miles. South America adds nearly 17,000 more, making in all nearly 40,000 miles for America. Japan has 13,000 miles. Japan's coast line is centered all there at home. Ours is scattered over the whole face of the ocean. If our fortifications are imperfect in the Atlantic, they are far more imperfect in the Pacific.

If the nations of Europe have armies that have bridged that ocean and are ready to come upon us when the time arrives, the nations of Asia have done likewise. Japan has 420,000 men under arms. There is not a hostile army within 500 miles. No nation ever carried that many men under arms long. Japan has a million tons of merchant marine. She can put between 150,000 and 200,000 men aboard ship in three days. She has 110,000 citizens in the Hawaiian Islands; America, 7,000. Japan has 100,000 Japanese in continental America, counting 80,000 trained soldiers. Ten thousand soldiers on the Pacific slope are organized into compact clubs. Within a section of only four squares in Oakland Japanese clubs have six shooting galleries. Nine companies of Japanese have been organized in Vancouver. Japan has established a great naval base at Kelung, in Formosa, and one at the Pescadores. She has organized a Filipino-Japanese party in the Philippine Islands. Japan has built up her navy in like proportion. She has now practically ready two Dreadnoughts, and laid down two more. This year she is to lay down seven more, making eleven great ships. Some have imagined that the great Japanese preparations were intended for China. They do not need all those Dreadnoughts for Chinese gunboats.

There is not an armored ship of any European nation in the Pacific Ocean. I am not talking about war. It is the other side that puts war talk into my mouth. I am giving facts that, as patriots, we have no right to neglect.

We sent sixteen battle ships to the Pacific Ocean. Two more have joined, making eighteen, together with eight armored cruisers, making altogether twenty-six. Japan has eleven armored cruisers and eleven battle ships, making twenty-two. She is adding the Ibuki and Kuroma, making twenty-four; she has added the Sitsuma and the Aki, two Dreadnoughts. The comparison of the gentleman from Tennessee yesterday of a great ship against four small ones is simply astonishing, as though a great ship with three more knots' speed would let four small vessels assemble around her and, while they concentrate their fire upon her, she would carefully distribute her fire equally among them. The firing of the modern battle ship has been revolutionized.

You can keep your gun on the target all the time and stand off 6,000, 7,000, and 8,000 yards and hit with a majority of the shots. These great ships of Japan that carry sixteen great guns, having three knots an hour more speed, can choose their distance and concentrate all their fire on a single vessel. There are experts who will tell you that the gun fire of one of these ships can destroy any existing fleet that might approach. By a conservative estimate one of these is equivalent to four smaller vessels, and the two would be equivalent to eight, making the total Japanese fleet equivalent to thirty-two. Thus if we should send every ship of the Navy to the Pacific, and absolutely strip the whole Atlantic Ocean, we could not keep pace with Japan in the next five years.

I have pointed out that the minimum basis of our duty in the Pacific and our duty to the Atlantic is six ships for each ocean. Even admitting that a single fleet could serve in both oceans, which it could not do, on account of the vast distance between the oceans, we should have to provide six ships as the minimum this year. A programme of only four is thus down to bed rock and touches the danger point. It is natural that Japan should desire to control in the East. Just emerging from mediævalism, it is natural that she should wish to extend her dominions and to take our possessions. It is natural that she should marshal her own power and the power of China and the power of India—the power of the yellow man—to gain supremacy of the world.

The moment the American fleet leaves the Pacific Ocean they could take our possessions without any resistance. We have no transports to carry our Army to retake them, and we have no army ready. Our fleet could not take them, and the attempt to get them back again would be more futile than it would be to get even with any nation of Europe.

It is not necessary to point out the grave danger that lurks in a race problem between the yellow and white races. Territorial and commercial considerations show the danger of conflict, notably the question of the open-door policy in China. America must be prepared to take care of her own interests.

And if she will take care of her own interests, she will do a great duty to the world. If we had had $50,000,000 worth more of battle ships in 1898 when we called upon Russia to evacuate Manchuria she would have evacuated, and that would have spared the world that war. Every movement of Japan and the European powers tends toward the division of China.

When the partition of China begins this world will be set on fire, and out of that fire the great nations of Europe will discover that the yellow man does not love one white man more than another. While Germany would probably be the next to be thrown out of Asia, and France would follow, and the British last.

The papers Japan is controlling throughout China are teaching the Chinese to hate all foreigners. The dismemberment of China would thus precipitate a great race war. Our investigation thus far has been for the Atlantic Ocean and Pacific Ocean separately. It is necessary to consider them together.

The nations of the white race have hated one another so long that they ask nothing better than to play off another race against them. A nation of Asia, preparing for war with America, would proceed to get an alliance with a nation of Europe.

There is existing to-day a hard and fast, offensive and defensive alliance between Great Britain and Japan. There has been one official interpretation of that alliance. This was by the premier of the Dominion of Canada on February 28. In defending the leaving of the question of immigration of Japanese into Canada to the Japanese Government, he stated that Canada should do that because they would expect the Japanese to come to Vancouver in time of war, and they ought to let them come in time of peace; that he could see how, for defense of common interests in the northern Pacific, the Japanese and British ships would be together, and would weigh anchor from Vancouver. It is true that the public, published part of that Anglo-Japanese treaty specifies the regions of India and of eastern Asia; but no Japanese fleet would come over to Vancouver to start toward India. The British Government has yet to disclaim the interpretation of that treaty by the premier of Canada.

Let me repeat that I am not talking war; I am talking facts. We have 90,000,000 of people. I will take second place to no man in appreciating their strength and their willingness, if necessary, to fight for liberty and for home and country, but the yellow man can fire as straight as the white man. The yellow man can live on one-tenth of what the white man can. We have felt free from danger from invasion from Europe, although we are not free from raids. We may be free from invasion from Europe, but, my countrymen, we are not free from invasion from Asia. The location of our Pacific coast places it, with the open ocean toward Asia, in a dangerous condition, with Japan in alliance with a great maritime power of Europe that would keep the ocean open. The unlimited myriads of Asia could descend upon our shores. We are within reasonable distance of the point where this nation may have to fight for its very existence.

I here proclaim you may refuse to recognize the inevitable facts if you wish, but the time is coming when this nation, not only to do its duty in the world, but to preserve its very existence, will either have to turn the country into a mighty army or it will have to control the sea in the Atlantic Ocean and the Pacific Ocean, both at the same time. Which should be the choice—to turn our citizens into soldiers or a small part of our wealth into ships?

I realize full well that objections exist. I know the question of expense is thrown up at us. The war between Russia and Japan cost the South over $500,000,000 in the slump of cotton. Last year we lost $24,000,000 in the markets for cotton goods alone. I pointed out the cost of the Spanish war.

In 1812 we had a disastrous war. If we had had a substantial navy, the British would never have persisted in violating our rights in the Atlantic Ocean, we would have had no war, Washington City would not have been burned. Before that we paid two and a half million dollars to the Barbary pirates as tribute and ransom. One-half of that would have given us a fleet that would have prevented war and would have insured the security of our commerce. In 1800 France would not even respect our rights as neutrals, and we had a war with France. If we had had a navy there would have been no war. When you come to discuss the question of expense you are dealing with a disease. War is a disease. America's Navy is a preventive, and every dollar in ships will save us hundreds of thousands of dollars that would otherwise be lost in war.

I know there are some who distrust their country. They are afraid if we have a great navy we will abuse the power. I think a man descends pretty low when he chooses to think a mean thing about his own country when there is no occasion for it. I ask any gentleman here, Would your constituents have this nation play the part of a bully, simply because we had a big navy? Of course not. Neither would mine. It is not so abroad. Abroad a czar, an emperor, a monarch, or an ambitious dynasty can have a nation's power turned to conquest and oppression. In America it would have to be the people, and they would not do it. In analyzing the power that there is in 90,000,000 of people you know we have found out that they are the safest guardians of liberty. Do you not realize that those 90,000,000 of people, men who do not hate any other people in the world engaged in peaceful pursuits, are the one repository in this world with which you can trust great power?

Do you trust the British with a navy three times as big as ours more readily than you would trust America? Great Britain and the other nations have enemies—have had enemies down the ages. Their navies are specifically for war. America has no enemy. Her navy is for peace. Somebody has to have the biggest. Which ought it to be? Mark you, and believe me, my countrymen, I am not advocating permanent navies. I am pointing out the path which in the shortest time, with America keeping the peace of the world, her interests justifying her intervention and giving a chance to create an international organization that will be adequate for peace, and thus lead to the point where America and all other nations can give up their navies. But you know, as practical men, that we have not yet reached that point. Nations still have to have navies.

I submit it to you, as long as they have to have navies, then America, the peace nation, ought to have the biggest navy. You can not escape this conclusion. But some say that this is the advocacy of force. It is nothing of the kind. I have lived in Europe, I have lived in Asia, I have seen enough of the reign of might and brute force around the world. The reign of might and brute force is the trouble with the suffering world. It is time some nation of peace and beneficence could have some influence in the great councils of the nations. This is the way in which in the shortest time to put an end to the reign of force in the world. Some say, "Oh, he is a young man who wants war; he has had a taste of war." Mr. Chairman, it cured me, that taste did. I see men before me who in the great war would get up before breakfast and do more fighting than was done in the Spanish war altogether. You ask them if they do not believe me.

I do not care how hot-blooded a man may be before he goes in. Let him go in and get a taste of war, and that will make of him a disciple of peace for the rest of his days. There has never been a greater slander on any men than to say that men of war want war.

I climbed aboard the Teresa three days after the battle of Santiago. As I came over the gangway I saw a gun's crew dead, every man at his post. An 8-inch shell had penetrated the armor and exploded and killed them all. Being a naval constructor, I jumped down on the protective deck to examine to see if the structure had been blown up between the upper coal bunkers. It was gloomy. I saw a man in a corner. I wondered what he was doing there. I found that the main steam pipe ran from the boilers forward to the engine room aft underneath the deck, and they had put in a special stop valve and brought a spindle up through the deck, so that if the pipe was cut and it proved impossible to reach the regular stop valve in the engine room, then a man located above the deck in battle using a double ratchet wrench could shut it off from above.

Fire had swept over the ship, and that man had been burned up. Have you ever seen those figures at Pompeii, figures of men and animals, that had been asphyxiated? They were nothing like that man. When he found he was getting weaker, he got down on his knees and he put his chin down on his chest. There he was, burned to a crisp, but the charred bones of his fingers were still grappling his wrench. [Applause.]

When I think of the Spanish war my heart cries out, "How long, how long must noble men continue to slay each other in this way?" When the smoke raised from the battlefields of Manchuria and the martial spirit of the world was aroused, I could see men dead and dying, 500,000 of them. I knew that America, had she done her duty to the world, could have spared the world that war.

I have been out in Japan and in those countries. I have seen the huts and the homes of the peasants. Life is hard at its best. I knew that the women and children there were weeping and wailing for dear ones that never could return. I know that widows and orphans are going through the hard world today without the protection of father, husband, son, or brother. And I know our country could have spared it all. Some one says he talks navy and war because that is his profession. You might as well tell a doctor that he talks surgery because that is his profession. I have gone into these things, my countrymen. The war clouds are gathering. I have gone about America and I have made over 1,700 speeches in the cities pleading for peace.

Four hundred and forty-one audiences, aggregating over 400,000 persons, assembled at representative American cities, situated in forty-two States of the Union have adopted the following resolution practically unanimously:

In the interest of peace and justice: Be it

Resolved by this gathering of representative citizens, That general treaties of arbitration should be negotiated by the United States with all nations, granting jurisdiction to the international court at The Hague over as many classes of controversies as the other contracting power in each case can be induced to transfer from the field of battle to the precincts of courts of justice.

2. That the United States should declare in favor of a permanent international congress, containing representatives from every nation, to assemble periodically and automatically for the purpose of suggesting such changes in the law of nations and in the method of its administration as the current of events may make desirable and practicable.

3. That present conditions call for the immediate adoption of a progressive naval programme that will give the United States a Navy capable of performing its duty, i. e., of protecting our vast seacoast, our great and ever-increasing volume of ocean-going commerce, our growing interests in foreign markets, our distant possessions, and of executing effectively all the just foreign policies of the nation.

4. That the chairman appoint a committee of three to call upon the mayor, who is hereby requested to join with said committee in communicating this resolution to the Representative in Congress of this district, the two Senators from this State, and the President of the United States.

This resolution has likewise been unanimously adopted by the legislature of Georgia and the legislature of New York.

I have gone tirelessly about the land night and day, just pleading for peace because I see the war clouds are gathering—clouds that would bring not only war between nations of the white race, but a great war between the races of the world, and I see America upon the apex in mid-ocean, the friend of all nations, kin to the other nations, the one great nation without territorial ambitions, standing for the rights of men and for those just policies between nations that make peace, enduring peace, possible. I see America placed here to send the black clouds of war back below the horizon. It is not a dream, not a vision. You and I can do it. Let us begin now by authorizing four battle ships in this appropriation bill.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, notwithstanding the dire forecasts to which we have listened that the world will soon be afire and that the war clouds are gathering, I am gratified to notice that equanimity and contentment still prevail in this Chamber. We are not afraid that the disaster will come upon us, at least until after we conclude the consideration of this bill. But I can not listen to such an address as that which has just been made in the House without words of emphatic dissent, I might even say of rebuke.

The United States is not a country which, like a quarrelsome belligerent, stands with a mailed fist raised aloft, ready to strike the first offender, nor is it a country which will maintain the specious pretense that upon it rests the responsibility of maintaining by force the peace of the world. [Applause.] Our chiefest distinctions are that we are in the forefront of modern civilization; that ours are the triumphs of commerce, of industry, and of science; that here, more than anywhere else on the globe, we have maintained the importance of each individual; and that we give respect and reverence to the teachings of Christianity. We have made peace between nations; and the crowning glory of Theodore Roosevelt's career, when the whole history is written, will be that he brought the warring nations of Japan and Russia together. [Applause.] You would have to search with a microscope to find that one battle ship or twenty battle ships had anything to do with that magnificent achievement in the cause of the world's peace. It was accomplished rather by a reliance upon his fairness, upon the justice and disinterestedness of the American people, factors which would have been swept away if we had those ambitions which belong to a country having a great navy and seeking to dominate the nations of the earth. [Applause.]

The fundamental fallacy in all these arguments is that in this day neither an individual nor a nation is safe unless he goes armed. Just exactly the contrary is true. [Applause.]

Why is life worth living now? Why, it is because a spirit of humanity has so come to possess the people that the weak are protected alike with the strong. [Applause.] The cause of him who is wronged is the strongest cause that can exist under heaven. When sympathy is aroused it is a factor more potent than armies. This is certainly true of the individual. Why is it that chivalry gives such respect to the tenderer sex? Because she is weaker, because she is entitled to the protection of the stronger. Our sheltering, our protecting hand does not go out to the Amazon; she does not need our protection, because she is strong enough already. [Laughter.] So it is with nations. No nation can afford to impose on a weak people. The public opinion of the civilized world is stronger than the armies and navies of the proudest empire. [Applause.]

Suppose some nation of Europe should go to South America and seek to subject a weak people there. In this day those nations to the south have such a degree of civilization that the excuse could not be made that is made in the case of barbarous tribes. Why, the whole civilized world would rise up and legions would crowd to the bar of nations, crying "Hands off! hands off!" [Applause.] Let the strong keep away from the weak. And yet we are not weak. I listened here once to the singing of patriotic songs at a close of a Congress, and in face of the vigor, patriotism, and high aspirations displayed, with the gift of song that was shown in this Chamber, along with a certain glamor and enthusiasm of the occasion, there was one thought that came to me more than any other, and that was, What nation anywhere could stand up against this free America in case of a conflict? War is not a matter alone of armies, but of resources and endurance, and in that particular we stand far ahead of any other nation on the globe. Certain ones say to us—some of those who are most earnest in their advocacy of the battle ship—there will be war with Germany, or war with England, perhaps, or war with France. But those nations can not thrive without the supplies obtained from this country. Why, if you shut off England from obtaining food from this country in six months there would be starvation. Talk about sending battle ships up the difficult channel of the St. Lawrence! There would be no boundary line between the United States and Canada by the time the battle ships got across the Atlantic. [Laughter and applause.]

Some persons talk about war between Japan and China. They talked about war between France and Germany over the Morocco incident. There was a very strong occasion for war between England and Russia over the incident off the Dogger Bank, but the good sense of the nations prevailed over the hysteria of those who were shouting for a war and war did not materialize. There is now a solidarity of interest——

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. If time permits at the close of my remarks I will try to answer the question; my time is very short. There is a solidarity of interest among the nations of the earth—such that war will not be tolerated. It is practically impossible between civilized nations unless some irresistible ground for conflict exists, as did exist in the case of Japan and Russia. I must say as regards Japan that no nation which has made leaps and bounds into the family of civilized nations has behaved with more moderation than the Japanese. [Applause.] Along with their remarkable military triumph there has been a magnificent growth in civilization and in those features which bring them into line with modern life; but if there were to be a contest between this country and Japan, what would it be? It would be a contest between races, and I am not willing to give up the idea that the Caucasian race will be dominant in the world's affairs for all time. [Applause.] There has been a good deal of talk about how Japan was going after the Philippines. A great relief has been given to that alarm within a few days by the talk of designs which Japan has upon Australia. [Laughter and applause.] Why, that is rational; if Japan has designs, it is against the civilization of the western world, so that it is out of the question that there should be any contest in which we would be alone. We have no entangling alliances. I rejoice in the thought that, although if we should be involved in a struggle no marching armies from other nations would keep step for our support, nevertheless in any quarrel of ours with any people of Asia it is not our cause, it is the cause of them all; and you can lay that down as a feature of this situation which will make for our defense and for the protection of the world's peace as well.

I have listened oftentimes to the talk of our becoming peacemakers by building a navy. How absurd that is! Great Britain starts in as a peacemaker and has a navy sufficient to quell disorder anywhere in the world, to make disorderly peoples behave themselves. But Germany thinks that it is not enough; she must also be a peacemaker more than Great Britain. France comes into the list, and she must be a peacemaker; and this competition in peacemaking is a spectacle in the eyes of the world. [Applause.] But these armed peacemakers will not command confidence. The increase of navies is to increase the might and the prestige of the countries which build them, and for each enlargement in our naval programme the whole world will look with an added degree of suspicion upon us, thinking that our designs are not for peace, but for empire and for the enlargement of our dominion.

I have stood here often, and I stand here now, for the principle that this country should take the lead in the paths which lead to peace; that we should take advantage of our magnificent isolation, of the confidence that other nations place in us. Thus we will have the confidence of the world and be able to make peace in proportion as our policy looks to peace.

Several years ago in my wanderings I visited the beautiful town of Samara, in far-off Russia, where the plains bear away toward Asia, where Slav and Tartar combine in making the population. I was in a garden which looked much like those in western Europe, and there was a band that was playing for the people. They were playing the Marseillaise. It was suggested to the Russian officer that we who were Americans would like to have the band play some American air, the Star Spangled Banner, perhaps. The officer went to the bandstand, put his hand on the shoulder of the leader, and immediately the band stopped their tune and began to play Hail Columbia, Happy Land. [Applause.] There was a scene which would warm any American heart. The swains who were strolling around in the grove drew together and listened with an intense degree of eagerness, demanding a repetition, not once or twice, but thrice. There was an outburst of enthusiasm that made the wanderers feel as if they were at home. [Applause.] It was not the music of Hail Columbia—for that was inferior to some of the other tunes—but the throng recognized that those sweet strains told of a land beyond the mountains and the plains, across the wide ocean, where the watchwords are progress, liberty, truth, and equal opportunity; a land to which the poor and the struggling may look up with hope in the belief that some day, as a beacon light, its beneficence will extend to the darkest portion of the earth. [Great applause.]

So I say it is by seeking peace that we shall maintain our glory, our influence, our prestige among the nations. I would not say that we should abandon our naval strength. Personally I believe in one battle ship and one battle ship only, according to the enunciated programme of several years ago. [Applause.] But I now register my protest, and I hope I shall have opportunity again to register it, against this ambitious programme. What a man earnestly desires in his youth, that sometimes he may have in its fullness in his old age. I have respect for the idealists who look forward to the future. I am willing to be counted as one of them in my advocacy of what I believe to be the truth, in the firm conviction that, not to-day, perhaps, but in the near future, we shall join with other nations by peaceful methods, by arbitration, and by manifestations of reason and good will, as the leaders in a lasting peace which shall diffuse its influence all over the globe. [Loud applause.]

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LILLEY].

Mr. LILLEY. Mr. Chairman, I propose to introduce a joint resolution which, if adopted, will save the cost of these two odd battle ships every year. It reads as follows:

Joint resolution.

Whereas there has been gross extravagance and lamentable misappropriation of public funds, to the extent of more than $100,000,000, in expenditures on or in navy-yards and naval stations in excess of what business men would have expended to produce the same results; and

Whereas great economies may be effected by the Federal Government by the abandonment and sale of certain navy-yards and naval stations and the reorganization of the others: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President shall appoint, immediately after the passage of this act, a commission consisting of three members, two of whom shall be men of reputed ability in the management of large industrial affairs, and a retired naval officer who has served as chief of bureau, whose duty it shall be to report to the President and Congress upon the advisability of the abandonment and sale of navy-yards and naval stations at Kittery, Me.; Port Royal and Charleston, S. C.; Key West, Fla.; New Orleans, La., and Mare Island, Cal., and to make such recommendations as they see fit for improving the organization and efficiency of navy-yards and naval stations and eliminating the waste of public moneys in the maintenance of same.

SEC. 2. That the commission shall appoint a secretary, to perform such duties as the commission may designate, and it shall be the duty of the commission to file its final report on or before the 1st day of January, 1909.

SEC. 3. That the commission shall have the power to summon witnesses, administer oaths, and call for papers and accounts.

SEC. 4. That each member of the commission shall receive during the term of service the sum of $3,000, and the secretary the sum of $1,500. The traveling expenses of all members of the commission, including secretary, also all other necessary expenses, shall be paid by the Treasurer upon warrant of the chairman of the commission, and for this purpose is hereby appropriated the sum of $15,000, or such part thereof as may be required, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

In view of the fact that Admiral Goodrich has been appointed to visit all the yards on the Atlantic coast to make an inspection, it may be of interest to hear what he says in the New York Tribune of April 4:

Rear-Admiral Goodrich takes occasion to express himself concerning the existence of certain navy-yards; he has communicated to the Washington authorities the belief that there are too many navy-yards; that only a few are really necessary on each coast and that the others should not only be closed up, but the ground upon which they stand sold or otherwise ceded, so that on no pretext can they ever be opened again.

Mr. Chairman, I desire also to quote a few words from Rear-Admiral Stephen B. Luce, whom naval officers unanimously concede to be one of the ablest business officers, of whom we have very few in the United States Navy:

About twenty years ago the Secretary of the Navy, not satisfied with the business methods of our navy-yards, propounded the following query: Whether a given navy-yard is fully equipped with the necessary appliances for the prompt and economical execution of such work as may be required to place it in proper condition for the probable demands of war?

A portion of the answer of the board of officers to whom the question was addressed is given herewith at length, as it goes to the very root of the matter and shows clearly that the unbusinesslike methods which obtain in our navy-yards have their origin in the defects inherent in the Navy Department. The logical conclusion—the conclusion from which one can not escape—is, as there stated, that reforms in our navy-yard methods must begin in the Department itself.

To a proper understanding of the subject, it should be stated that the present wasteful extravagance in employing so great an excess of nonproducers and the inefficient system of doing business which has for years past been steadily increasing in our navy-yards is but the natural outgrowth of the constitution of the Navy Department itself. Each navy-yard is made up of a number of separate and comparatively independent establishments, little principalities, as it were, each owing allegiance to its own sovereign, the chief of bureau to which it belongs.

Thus each department has been gradually building itself up so as to be independent of all other departments. Each of the principal departments has its own body of artisans, its own machinery, its own steam generators, and its own peculiar method of doing business.

In this way it has come that some of our yards are filled up with machinery far beyond their actual needs, and it is no exaggeration to say that there is to-day enough machinery of various kinds in either the New York or the Boston yard to do the work of its own particular class of the entire Navy. We habitually speak of a private shipyard as a "plant;" but each of our national shipyards is a segregation of "plants," each having its own separate organization and each its own internal regulations. Many illustrations might be given to show how, through the want of concert of action among these several "plants," useless and vexatious delays occur, to say nothing of the waste of time and public money due to such diffusion.

To make such radical changes as we propose was no easy task, nor did we expect that they could be effected without considerable friction, not to say opposition; but supposing the changes to be made on a basis laid down by the commission, it is hardly to be hoped, that under present conditions they will be permanent. For whatever changes may be introduced now, and howsoever beneficial they may be, still the same causes remaining in active operation must inevitably produce the same result, and in time restore the system of independent plants with all its intendent evils. Hence we conclude that to organize our Navy on a just and permanent basis, to consolidate their several plants, to introduce thrift in the management and promptness in the methods of doing the work, with a proper system of accountability; to secure, in short, in each of our yards, unification, method, economy, and dispatch with an administration of its affairs agreeable to the principles of business as understood in civil life, it is absolutely necessary to begin within the Navy Department itself.

"It must be evident that there is something radically wrong with the Department," wrote the Secretary of the Navy in his annual report to Congress under date of November 30, 1885, and he adds: "The universal dissatisfaction is the conclusive proof of this." He then proceeds to dissect the bureau system as it then existed with merciless precision, and gives to the world a record of mismanagement, of wasteful expenditure, of injudicious and ill-advised disposition of public moneys, such as should have led to immediate and salutary reforms.

For the seventeen years preceding his administration over $75,000,000 had been substantially thrown away.

In 1895 the Secretary still further simplified the business methods of the Navy Department, but left the question of reorganization untouched.

* * * * * * *

The report of the Secretary of the Navy of November, 1903, alludes to the defective organization of his Department in no uncertain terms. He repeats substantially what was said eighteen years ago, of eight bureaus working independently of each other: "The distribution of a business among bureaus independent of and related to each other unquestionably creates a condition out of which grow conflicts of jurisdiction between the bureaus and a tendency to consider the interests of the bureaus rather than the interests of the Navy. The division of business in the bureaus * * * extends to the navy-yards, and even, to some extent, to ships in commission. This leads to excessive and cumbersome organization and lack of harmony of effort, resulting from the fact that there is no coordination, except by the voluntary action of bureau chiefs, short of the Secretary's office itself."

As further evidence of the appreciation of unbusinesslike methods within the Navy itself, I quote from a personal letter written me by a former Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks:

"There is a more of less well-grounded opinion that shore stations are unduly expensive. Also everyone in the Navy, as well as out of the Navy, will agree that the shore stations are more numerous than is necessary for the care of the fleet. Those who are acquainted with the internal organization and working of the navy-yards are also aware that there has been duplication of organization and plant."

Such statements from gentlemen whose positions and daily work have made them especially familiar with the needs of the Navy is in itself sufficient to commend to your favorable consideration the resolution which I have presented to you.

But I wish to present to you a few concrete facts in reference to six yards and naval stations that no doubt of the need of business reorganization of the Navy may linger in any mind.

Let us first consider the Mare Island Navy-Yard. The Secretary of the Navy has said that this plant has cost the people $17,000,000. It has a magnificent stone dry dock which cost $1,175,000, but I have at hand a letter from the Secretary in which he states that "the present stone dry dock at Mare Island will not permit the docking of a battle ship," and not only is this true, but a battle ship can not get to the yard. In a letter dated March 11, 1907, the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks wrote to the Secretary of the Navy that "Due to the silt in suspension in the waters of San Pablo Bay, which settles at slack water, the natural tendency of channels in the vicinity is to shoal."

Ten years ago, in June, 1898, Admiral M. T. Endicott, then Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, said in his annual report to the Secretary of the Navy:

"If keeping the navigation open for the depth stated above (28 feet) is impossible without a very large annual expense, amounting to several hundred thousand dollars, then the Government should take early steps to establish a navy-yard on the waters of San Francisco Bay at some point where such difficulties will not be encountered, where the yard will be safe from an attack from fleets on the sea, and where a permanent depth of navigation of 30 feet can be had between it and the sea."

Although Rear-Admiral Endicott practically recommended in these words the abandonment of this yard ten years ago, since that time $728,886.12 has been spent on dredging alone, and $5,124,712.49 has been appropriated and spent on this yard since then.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentlemen, Is it not a fact under the same conditions larger amounts of moneys have been expended at League Island and at Portsmouth for dredging than at Mare Island?

Mr. CURRIER. Was ever a dollar expended for dredging at Portsmouth?

Mr. KNOWLAND. More money has been expended at Portsmouth and more money at League Island than has been expended at Mare Island.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I want to say to the gentleman that he can not point to where a penny ever was spent at Portsmouth for dredging. It has 60 feet of low water and 80 to 90 feet when you get out to the bay.

Mr. LILLEY. At low water the depth at the entrance to the channel, Napa creek, at the south end of Mare Island is 20 feet. Consider the depth of the Mare Island channel and compare the draft of our battle ships—a channel of 20 feet for the battle ship Connecticut, with its maximum draft of 27 feet 4¾ inches; for the North Dakota, with its maximum draft of 29 feet 10 inches, and greater drafts for the battle ships of the future. I note the Scientific American, of February 22, 1908, states that "all of the Pacific fleet started out floating below their official full-load draft," and that "a battle ship can be loaded until she draws 30 or even 35 feet of water."

Of what use, then, is this navy-yard at Mare Island, with its channel of 20 feet, to the battle-ship squadron of to-day, to say nothing of that of the future?

But here are some striking figures of interest and especial significance to any business man. In the year ending 1907 the expenditures for labor were $1,620,678.88, while the total amount of work done was $928,582.97; in other words the workmen alone, with no consideration of the interest on and depreciation of a $17,000,000 plant, were paid in one year $692,095.91 more than the value of their product.

Key West is a place that has cost us $1,238,038.41. It is 6 miles from the straits and the low-water depth in its channel is 26 feet, and $101,000 has been spent there for dredging.

Here we have another of those labor expenditures that would bring a Carnegie out of his chair with a jump. At this yard, in the fiscal year ending in 1907, $94,318.77 was expended for labor and the value of their total product was but $7,126.18, or there might just as well have been tossed on the coral reefs $87,192.59 as far as any return to the Government was concerned, and yet last session Congress voted to throw $44,500 more of good money after the bad.

Portsmouth, N. H., or Kittery, Me., is a plant that has cost us over $10,000,000. Since voters from two States labor here the expenditure for labor will, perhaps, be of interest. In 1907, $792,760.05 was expended for labor and $418,804.12 was the total value of the work done; or, were this a well-to-do corporation, it would mean an invasion of its surplus to the extent of $373,955 for the fiscal year ending in 1907, but for most corporations it would mean bankruptcy before the end of one year.

At Kittery there is a dry dock which cost $1,100,000. The dock is in readiness for the docking of battle ships, but the "approaches are in such a condition as to make it inadvisable to take a battle ship to that yard." This is the statement of the Secretary of the Navy.

Last summer when I visited Portsmouth with other members of the Committee on Naval Affairs aboard the Dolphin I was surprised that the captain did not go up to the yard. In answer to my inquiry, the commander, a most excellent and efficient officer, said that it was not safe to take even so small a craft as the Dolphin up to the yard, because of the dangers from the swift current and narrow channel. I note that the map of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey gives warning of the swift currents in the river and states that slack lasts about ten minutes.

Mr. CURRIER. May I ask the gentleman a question? I will ask you if you did not observe, when you went in on the Dolphin, that there were colliers nearly as large as battle ships coming in?

Mr. LILLEY. I did not see them.

Mr. CURRIER. I did. I was in Portsmouth, and I saw them.

Mr. LILLEY. It is especially dangerous and impracticable for a battle ship nearly 500 feet long to round Hendersons Point, and the fact remains that the expensive dock has never docked a battle ship, and $244,900 more was appropriated for this place the last session of Congress.

Mr. CURRIER. May I ask the gentleman another question? Does not the gentleman understand that with the removal of Hendersons Point, when that work is completed, the channel will be almost double in width what it is now?

Mr. LILLEY. It will be like the removal of Muscle Shoals, on the Tennessee River. They have spent years in doing that and it has never been completed.

Mr. CURRIER. Ninety-five per cent of this has been completed now. Does not the gentleman know that?

Mr. LILLEY. No; I do not.

Mr. CURRIER. I understand it to be so.

Mr. LILLEY. In answer to that question, I understand it will not affect the conditions at this place.

Mr. CURRIER. It widens the channel about 400 feet.

Mr. LILLEY. In answer to the question, Did they work at the New Orleans Navy-Yard in 1907? I give you these figures: $78,274.05 was spent by the Government for labor, and the total product was $1,046.01.

But the point that the business man would fail to comprehend is that $10,000 was appropriated both sessions of the last Congress for new construction at New Orleans, for what advantage to the United States Navy God only knows.

We have here a dry dock which has cost us $833,625. It has been used twice for battle ships. Fortunately it is a floating dry dock, and may and ought to be towed over to Pensacola or some other place where it may serve some use for the fleet.

It is significant that as long ago as 1876 a board of naval officers, of which the gallant warrior, Admiral David D. Porter, was chairman, recommended that "the naval ground at New Orleans be abandoned and dispensed with."

Since 1900 alone $2,126,971.05 has been spent here. I have not the figures to show how much more would have been saved the people had the representatives of the people in Congress taken Admiral Porter's advice.

In the message from President Harrison to Congress, dated January 19, 1892, there is this statement:

> The requisition for a dry dock, then, are a clear channel to the sea of a depth of at least 26 feet, etc.

Charleston, although built ten years later, after battle ships had already undergone a great increase in size, has but 25 feet of water in its channel.

Mr. LEGARE. Will the gentleman permit me? I just simply want to state that that statement is absolutely untrue, and the gentleman knows it, because the chart shows it has 31 feet at high water.

Mr. LILLEY. You are making your charge against the Secretary of the Navy. Mr. Chairman, I am simply stating this from the chart published by the Government.

Mr. LEGARE. In my opinion, what you are quoting from the Secretary of the Navy is erroneous, incorrect, and untrue, and I told you so before.

Mr. LILLEY. You can state that to the Secretary. Yet Congress has appropriated $1,198,984 to build there a magnificent dry dock. Not only is the channel too shallow, but there is no berthing room for vessels, and no ship of any description has ever been docked there.

The total establishment has cost $3,394,300 and the dredging $108,000. I find the most remarkable showing in the line of labor. Here during the past five years $213,213.75 has been disbursed among laborers, and there has never been done for the Navy one cent's worth of work at this yard. Yet last session of Congress $287,000 more was appropriated for this yard at Charleston.

On page 37 of Senate Document No. 156, Fifty-Sixth Congress, second session, are these words:

> Senator TILLMAN. We will have to keep abreast of these other fellows. League Island now wants an appropriation, and as we have got back into the Union we want our slice, too.
> Senator CHANDLER. That is very apparent, Senator, and always has been since you got into the Senate.

I wish to quote you a few words from the report of that gallant officer, Rear-Admiral G. W. Sumner, which may be found in Senate Document No. 188, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session:

> As to Charleston, it appears to me to be a place sui generis, a fossil, an antique, nonprogressive, and woefully and hopelessly in the rear, commercially and otherwise.
>
> The river opposite any proposed site is too narrow for a large vessel to turn or maneuver in.
>
> To accommodate many vessels in the stream, therefore, the water front of the station would have to be of abnormal length or extent.
>
> Its health and sanitary conditions are shocking and disgraceful.
>
> It has no proper sewerage system.
>
> It has no adequate fresh-water supply.
> It is the worst hurricane harbor in the coast.

It is not and can not be made a fit harbor for heavy deep-draft vessels, such as are common in this day.

Already over ten years of time and labor and $4,000,000 have been spent on the Charleston jetties, and to what purpose?

From an engineering point of view, it would seem to be an absurdity to locate a naval station anywhere in Charleston Harbor. A harbor with a jetty is not one to select for naval purposes, for reasons already stated.

And I would call your attention to these words, the wisdom of which is now fully realized:

I do strongly advise against any change from Port Royal—especially any removal to any point at or in the vicinity of Charleston, S. C.

It is, indeed, unfortunate that naval officers are not free from Congressional restraint that the Government may be served with their best unbiased judgment in these matters, and it is an especial pleasure to find so able an officer so fearless and outspoken to Congress.

The naval station at Port Royal was removed to Charleston (1900–1903), but as late as 1907 $14,724.66 was spent here for labor, and although abandoned the expenditures will go on to the end of time unless the property is sold, given away, or blown up.

Thirty-two years ago the Naval Board, of which Admiral Porter was chairman, stated:

The board see no propriety in recommending a permanent naval station at Port Royal.

Yet in the last ten years we have expended $1,084,346.26.

The channel depth at Port Royal is 19½ feet. This yard might have been turned into an excellent naval training station, with barefoot weather the year round, at small cost. Congress saw fit instead to go to the Great Lakes, where five months in the year it is so cold that men must be trained for seamanship on house floors. An entirely new plant is necessary here, and the ultimate cost will undoubtedly be $10,000,000. Still another disadvantage is the shoal water near the training station.

Annapolis would have made an excellent naval training station had Congress seen fit to leave the buildings, which were excellent for the purpose of a training station, rather than destroy them, and to move the Academy down the Chesapeake Bay below Annapolis, where there was an ideal site with a harbor that can safely anchor all the battle ships in the world, and thus saved the $10,000,000 that is going to the Great Lakes.

In connection with Annapolis I wish to call attention to a few things, now ancient history, but none the less relevant.

For the construction of buildings at Annapolis the Government made forfeit time-limit contracts, but $724,768.43 due the Government as forfeit for noncompletion within the time limits has been waived to the contractors.

In 1906 some of the ablest business men in the country assisted Congress on the Board of Visitors and gave their time to a thorough investigation. They reported as follows:

We find an unfortunate state of affairs which dates from the inception of the plans of the new academy, and we are impressed with the conviction that a grave error was made both in planning for and in inaugurating the actual work.

After reviewing several noticeable defects they say:

It seems proper to call attention to the frequent ineffectiveness of the recommendations of the Board of Visitors and the apparent disregard of Congress to them.

Annapolis, for which Congress has seen fit to appropriate sums that will reach a total of over $10,000,000, is sunk in the mud. Battle ships can not reach the academy, and the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey reports show that the upper Chesapeake is fast filling up.

I desire to call the attention of the House to a few bills which have been introduced this session.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LILLEY. I would like to have about five minutes more.

Mr. SPERRY. I wish the gentleman might have the five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is not in control of the Chair.

Mr. LILLEY. Can the Chair tell me in whose control it is?

The CHAIRMAN. In the control of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss].

Mr. DAWSON. In the absence of the chairman of the committee from the Chamber, I would say that while I have no control over the time, I would gladly yield five minutes of the time that has been allotted to me for later in the day, if the Chair could recognize such an arrangement.

The CHAIRMAN. With that understanding the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LILLEY] for five minutes more.

Mr. CURRIER. Has the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LILLEY] been able to discover anything anywhere that meets with his approbation?

Mr. LILLEY. On December 2 Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama introduced a bill calling for a naval station at or near Fort Morgan, Ala.

On the next day Mr. COOPER of Texas called for the establishment of a dry dock on or near Sabine Pass.

On the 9th of December Mr. LAMAR of Florida came after "not more than $2,000,000 for a dry dock at Pensacola."

On the same day Mr. SULLOWAY, of New Hampshire, was after a million and a half for Portsmouth, although a battle ship can not get to this yard in safety.

On the 12th of December Mr. SMITH of California came into the field with a proposition for a dry dock on the Bay of San Diego, California, for which he called for a million.

On the 19th Mr. GRANGER, of Rhode Island, put in his proposition for a dry dock and repairing station "at a suitable strategic point on the Atlantic."

On January 6 Mr. GREGG presented the demands of Texas for a dry dock at or near Galveston, Tex.

And then on January 20 came the proposition to buy the defunct Jamestown Exposition, fathered by Mr. MAYNARD, of Virginia, which, if adopted, would add $2,500,000 to the grand total of waste on navy-yards.

Each one I imagine, like Senator TILLMAN, wants a "slice for his constituents."

A member of a recent Congress complained to me that although he had secured six millions out of the Treasury for his district an ungrateful constituency were supporting six competitors against him for renomination. I believe and I am certain the American people will believe that he should have given more attention to the country at large, rather than have kept an eye single to his particular district.

A noted professor [Wheeler] of history has made the statement that we had no democracy in this country before the civil war; that even when there was a majority from the North in Congress the superior political finesse of the politicians of the South thwarted their will. To-day political finesse is not dead nor confined to one section. I refer to the committee of conference, which, by time-honored custom, in case of disagreement between the two branches of the Legislature, may fix up these disagreements in this Navy bill to their own satisfaction, and usually they do not overlook their own districts. In case of a disagreement, the naval bill has gone to six gentlemen, a majority of whom have yards or stations in their districts, all of which ought to be abandoned, and one of these gentlemen has two in his district, neither of which, eminent naval experts have testified, should have been started.

Mr. Speaker, it is not likely that the constituents of these gentlemen will complain of pork that comes into their districts from Uncle Sam's barrel; but what about the rest of the country?

Three navy-yards care for Great Britain's large home squadron; we have testimony that New York or Boston could take care of ours. (Admiral Luce.) Compare our large number of yards, many of which are unnecessary, and look to the cause. Are we a national assembly of politicians, or are we here as the directors of the business of this nation for the people of this nation?

Why the waste of money at worthless yards year after year? I propose to you that the facts warrant the contention that no man should be a member of the Naval Committee who has a navy-yard in his district. Do judges try cases in which their own property is in question? Justice and the welfare of the nation can not be looked for when men act with the powerful influence of a navy-yard constituency hanging around them.

I have reference once more to the words of Rear-Admiral Sumner:

He says—

There is no sentiment, no sectionalism, rightfully attaching to a Government work of this kind; it is part of the national defense, a work of the first importance to the whole country.

There is little to be added to his patriotic words.

The incurring of avoidable expense, whether national or individual, does not commend itself to this community at the present time, nor does it commend itself to this country at any time.

Therefore I urge every Member of this House to vote against any appropriations for Charleston, Port Royal, Mare Island, Portsmouth, New Orleans, or Key West—at least not until a commission has investigated.

I ask you to oppose this waste of the people's money, because it is our sworn constitutional duty.

I have pointed out the waste in navy-yards that runs over years, but I would call especial attention to a proposed excessive profit for the Electric Boat Company of $1,471,520 in the naval bill now under consideration.

On submarine boats in the past this Electric Boat Company has received an excess profit of $1,519,738.58, making a past and proposed excessive profit of $2,991,258.58.

These figures are not guesses or conjectures, but are based on the statements of Admiral Bowles when a United States official, before he became a business man, the builder of these submarines for the electric-boat people.

I submit to the House statements which have gone to the select committee under House resolution 288:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 19, 1908.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Your committee has, I confess, somewhat to my surprise, permitted witnesses—both those who could by reason of expert knowledge know something of the construction, qualities, and cost of our present submarines, and also those who could have no possible expert or other knowledge as to the construction, performances, efficiency, and cost of these submarines—to give as part of their supposed testimony glowing accounts of the remarkable qualities of the Electric Boat Company's submarines, and having thus established the precedent, and in order that the question of the cost and efficiency of these boats may be presented on both sides, I submit the following, consisting of:

First. Extracts from the testimony of distinguished naval officers as to the cost of these boats, value of patents, etc., all of which testimony is of record in House documents therein referred to.

Second. A number of clippings from leading journals of the country setting forth in more or less detail the failure of the present submarines of the United States Navy in their experimental and other performances, which indicate that they are of but little practical value as defensive or offensive weapons as against any skillfully directed attack of a hostile fleet. It would appear as if the continuing failures of the present type of submarines in actual tests of efficiency is a complete answer to the somewhat ornamental and oratorical exploitation of them by the expert and nonexpert witnesses who thus appeared before your committee.

The newspaper clippings contained in the attached presentation are as follows: Army and Navy Register, March 14, 1908; New York Herald, June 5, 1907; Army and Navy Journal, March 14, 1908; Newport News Press, April 22, 1906; Newport News Press, May 4, 1906; New York World; Army and Navy Journal, October 26, 1907; New York Herald, February 22, 1908; Chicago Examiner, November 15, 1906; New York Sun, February 2, 7, 11, and 20, 1908; Army and Navy Journal, January 20, 1906; also House resolution No. 264.

Respectfully,

GEO. L. LILLEY.

Hon. H. S. BOUTELL,
Chairman Special Committee, House of Representatives.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE HOUSE NAVAL COMMITTEE JANUARY, 1901—HOLLAND SUBMARINE BOATS.

"Admiral O'NEIL. Congress already having authorized eight boats of the Holland type, at a total cost of about $1,360,000 ($170,000 each), may be said to have fulfilled all its obligations in this respect, and to have dealt liberally with the Holland Torpedo Boat Company, and has by its action afforded the Department ample means for experiment with boats of this particular type."

(Page No. 48, notation No. 2:)

"The CHAIRMAN. What is the cost of one of these boats?

"Admiral O'NEIL. I should think that from $75,000 to $100,000 would be a liberal sum."

(Page No. 53, notation No. 3:)

"Mr. HAWLEY. What is the cost of the French boats?

"Admiral O'NEIL. About $116,000 apiece, I believe.

"Mr. HAWLEY. Are they not paying as much as $150,000?

"Admiral O'NEIL. I think perhaps they are for one or two of their largest boats.

"Mr. HAWLEY. They have one 185 feet long?

"Admiral O'NEIL. I do not remember the cost of that.

"Mr. DAYTON. What is the size of the Holland?

"Admiral O'NEIL. Fifty-four feet long.

"Mr. DAYTON. How much longer do they propose to make the new ones?

"Admiral O'NEIL. They are to be 80 feet long, I think.

"Mr. HAWLEY. What size do they propose to make the new boats?

"Admiral O'NEIL. The present boat is 54 feet long, and the new boat is to be 63 feet long. I was mistaken when I said 80 feet. They are to be 11 feet in diameter and 120 tons displacement under water and 104 tons when on the surface.

"Mr. DAYTON. This French boat that you spoke about that costs $150,000—what is its size?

"Admiral O'NEIL. I do not remember.

"Mr. HAWLEY. One hundred and eighty-five feet.

"Mr. DAYTON. Is there any reason why we should pay $170,000 for a torpedo boat 63 feet long, when the French get a boat 185 feet long for $150,000?

"Admiral O'NEIL. As I have said, it depends upon whether you consider the cost of the boat alone or consider the amount of money spent for its development, and what you consider the device worth as a military device."

"Mr. KITCHIN. From your estimate of the cost, it seems to me that the Government ought to get these boats at $100,000 apiece.

"Admiral O'NEIL. That probably would be disputed by the company, but from my own observation, I think that would be a very liberal price for the Holland or the new Hollands."

REAR-ADMIRAL MELVILLE, CHIEF OF THE BUREAU OF STEAM ENGINEERING.

"The CHAIRMAN. What, in your judgment, is the probable cost of the manufacture of a Holland boat?

"Admiral MELVILLE. Between $50,000 and $70,000; $50,000 for the lowest limit and $70,000 for the highest. I have been calculating upon machinery for the last forty-five years—ships, hulls, and so forth."

(Page 3, notation 6, continued on page 12:)

"The CHAIRMAN. Will you kindly give your name in full?

"Mr. CREECY. Charles E. Creecy, Washington, D. C.

"The CHAIRMAN. Kindly state your business.

"Mr. CREECY. I am a lawyer by occupation. I have been connected with the Holland Torpedo Boat Company ever since some eight or ten years ago, and am thoroughly familiar with the history of it—all of its tribulations and trials—and I think I can answer intelligently any question that you gentlemen may desire to ask me on that subject.

"The CHAIRMAN. Are you the attorney for the company, Mr. Creecy?

"Mr. CREECY. I am the representative of the company in Washington to look after their interests in the Departments and in Congress. I had so much faith in this boat that I have gone on the company's bond to the extent of $60,000. I am a stockholder in the company, and have been connected with it as a stockholder and as its representative, as I have told you, since its inception."

(See also page 12:)

"In assessing the value of such rights said board shall take into consideration not only the value of the property, but also the fact that the United States shall have afforded facilities for the development of the inventions covered by such rights by the appropriation of money to build the Plunger.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE HOUSE NAVAL COMMITTEE ON SUBMARINE BOATS, 1902.

(Document No. 123, p. 1, notation 7:)

"Admiral O'NEIL. I know of no reason for changing the opinions expressed by me before this committee on January 15, 1901, with reference to submarine torpedo boats of the Holland type."

(Document No. 123, Melville, p. 13, May 26, 1902, on fair cost of Hollands.)

(Document No. 123, Melville, p. 22, notation No. 9:)

"Mr. DAYTON. Now, Admiral, you stated in your hearing before the committee last year that in your judgment the actual cost of a vessel of this kind would not exceed $50,000 to $70,000.

"Rear-Admiral MELVILLE. No, sir; that was my estimate for the Holland—the boat completed. The boats which are in course of construction are larger, and have a greater storage battery, and would naturally cost more money."

(Document No. 123, Melville, pp. 29 to 32:)

"Mr. RIXEY. You said a moment ago, in regard to the cost of this Holland boat, that you considered $70,000 as a reasonable cost for it.

"Rear-Admiral MELVILLE. Yes, sir; that was the maximum amount that I estimated as the cost of constructing the Holland—that is, the submarine boat which we now possess. I said that the new boats would cost more, as they had more displacement and greater storage.

"Mr. RIXEY. Did that include what ought to be allowed for the use of the patents?

"Rear-Admiral MELVILLE. No, sir. I attach very little value to the patents.

"Mr. RIXEY. What amount do you consider ought to be allowed for the use of the patents?

"Rear-Admiral MELVILLE. In my opinion they do not possess a patent that is of substantial value. The boat is filled with commercial auxiliaries. As for the storage battery, there are quite a number in use, and I hardly believe that you could get an electrical expert who would state that any one type of battery is of such efficiency that it can be sold for an excessive amount.

"They may have a patent on the arrangement of their submerging tanks, and their claims may be allowed as to several arrangements of mechanical movements.

"I do not encourage infringement of valuable patents, but there is often more than one way of securing mechanical results. For this reason I believe it will be possible for a shipbuilder to contract for a boat of the Holland principle without his being compelled eventually to pay royalty of any kind. There is no doubt but that the Holland people believe that they have valuable patents; otherwise the company would not have been formed. As I have been asked my opinion of the value of these patents, I give an opinion that has been formed after considerable careful study.

"Mr. RIXEY. Suppose that these patents would be valid, what ought to be allowed for the use of the patent in the building of each boat?

"Rear-Admiral MELVILLE. I do not know. If the Lake boat should prove to be the superior after competitive test, the patents could not have much commercial value.

"Mr. RIXEY. What would be a reasonable compensation?

"Rear-Admiral MELVILLE. Practically nothing from my standpoint. I recognize the fact, however, that they have some market value, particularly after the boat has been favorably indorsed by conscientious and distinguished naval officers.

"Mr. RIXEY. On the question of a consideration of the use of the patents, I want to ask you this: If this is a valuable invention and the patents are probably owned by this company, do you mean to state that they ought to have nothing for the use of their patents?

"Rear-Admiral MELVILLE. I hardly think I said that. I stated that I did not attach any value to them. Holding the view that I do, it is not probable that I would be asked officially for any opinion upon the matter. This will be a matter for the Secretary of the Navy or the courts to determine.

"Mr. RIXEY. I understand; but suppose they are valuable patents? You are talking about the value of the boat as it stands, the cost of the boat, outside of the question of its use. You stated that $70,000 was a fair price for the boat. Now, I want to know if that included the patents. You said 'No.'

"Rear-Admiral MELVILLE. It was the Holland that I referred to as costing $70,000; the new boats, being larger, should cost $90,000. This does not take into consideration at all any royalties that might be due to the Holland Company. My estimation is based upon what I believe is their proper cost.

"Mr. RIXEY. If the boat is of no account, you would not want to pay $70,000 for it; but if it is a valuable boat, what would you include in the price of the boat for the use of the patents?

"Rear-Admiral MELVILLE. I believe that 50 per cent profit over the cost of construction should compensate the company adequately. This sum would include profits as well as pay for the use of the patents. The patents would have to be valuable for the company to ask such profits. For profits alone I would not allow over 25 per cent increase.

"Mr. RIXEY. That would be profit, but would that be compensation for the patents? You take the ordinary contractor who builds a battle ship, and you expect him to make 25 per cent on the cost of the ship, do you not?

"Rear-Admiral MELVILLE. It may be that some of them make that profit. I am quite sure that all of them do not. I can only approximate as to what profit shipbuilding firms make.

"Mr. RIXEY. That does not pay the contractors for any patents.

"Rear-Admiral MELVILLE. No; but he has a plant that has cost him several million dollars, and he takes risks in putting such a large amount of capital in the business.

"Mr. RIXEY. There is profit upon his investment, but it is not for the patents.

"Rear-Admiral MELVILLE. Last year there were firms in this country who were capable of building battle ships who did not do so. The president of one shipbuilding firm told me that he was very indifferent about securing a contract for war ships. He could not have believed that there were such large profits in the work. If there is 25 per cent profit in the business, why is not the competition keener?

"Mr. RIXEY. Suppose a battle ship were invented, protected by patents, you would have to pay something in addition for those patents, and my idea was simply to get at what the Holland boat ought to cost complete.

"Rear-Admiral MELVILLE. I agree with you, Mr. Rixey, that if the patent rights are worth anything they should be paid for.

"Mr. RIXEY. What would be a reasonable compensation for them?

"Rear-Admiral MELVILLE. I will have to go back to what I said before. Personally I attach no value to them. There is a special law whereby inventors of military appliances can be reimbursed for the use of their patents."

STATEMENT OF REAR-ADMIRAL F. T. BOWLES.

(No. 123—Bowles. Notation No. 11, page 4:)

"The CHAIRMAN. I would like to ask you, Admiral, if you have made any investigation as to the cost of these boats?

"Admiral BOWLES. Yes. I have gone carefully into the matter of the cost of these boats.

"The CHAIRMAN. I mean, of course, of the Holland boat.

"Admiral BOWLES. Of the Holland boats. I have made a schedule of the cost of the boats under present construction.

"Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Excuse me, Admiral, right here. Is that the last boat?

"Admiral BOWLES. The boats now building under contract, and I have prepared a schedule of what I think would be a reasonable price for the boats now building.

"The CHAIRMAN. Would that price give them a reasonable profit?

"Admiral BOWLES. Give them a handsome profit.

"Mr. MEYER. Does it embrace the cost of administration?

"Admiral BOWLES. I was about to say that the cost of a submarine boat largely depends on the amount of experimentation which has to be done. That is certainly very expensive. Now, my calculations show that a reasonable cost, with a handsome profit to the contractor for the boats now building, would be $89,459.

"Of that I have allowed $11,100 for trials and tests. This price includes a fair percentage for the usual margin of general expenses, such as are incurred in manufacturing work, but nothing more.

"Mr. LESSLER. You are going to put that all in, are you not?

"Admiral BOWLES. No. I will answer any question with regard to the cost of the relative parts of the boat, but this is my memorandum.

"Mr. LESSLER. Very well.

"Mr. RIXEY. Admiral, in the statement you proposed a little while ago, the appropriation carries $125,000 for each boat, as I understand you?

"Admiral BOWLES. Yes, sir.

"Mr. RIXEY. You say $89,000 would carry a liberal profit?

"Admiral BOWLES. Yes.

"Mr. RIXEY. Why do you provide an appropriation of $125,000?

"Admiral BOWLES. I provide that because the provision requires the Secretary of the Navy to be satisfied that the boat is a substantial improvement upon anything now building. That, of course, will involve certain experimentation, and the provision says 'four or more;' that is, the price could not exceed $125,000, but it might be less.

"The CHAIRMAN. You have examined the hull of the Holland boats, as I understand it?

"Admiral BOWLES. Yes.

"The CHAIRMAN. What do you estimate as the cost of the hull?

"Admiral BOWLES. I estimate the cost of the hull at $13,835.

"The CHAIRMAN. What machines are there inside of her?

"Admiral BOWLES. The principal machine is the gasoline engine.

"The CHAIRMAN. What is that worth?

"Admiral BOWLES. I have allowed in my estimate $60 a horsepower for that, which is a very liberal price, and that makes the total value $9,600.

"The CHAIRMAN. What is the next important piece of machinery?

"Admiral BOWLES. The next important item is the storage battery.

"The CHAIRMAN. What do you value that at?

"Admiral BOWLES. I value it at $12,000.

"The CHAIRMAN. What is the next important bit of machinery?

"Mr. VANDIVER. Let me ask right there, does that include the dynamo and all?

"Admiral BOWLES. No, sir. The next most important item is the dynamo and motor. They are in one machine. For that I have allowed, with all its fittings, $3,850.

"The CHAIRMAN. What about the steering apparatus?

"Admiral BOWLES. For the steering and driving arrangements I have allowed $4,868.

"The CHAIRMAN. The ventilating apparatus or the tubing for the air?

"Admiral BOWLES. For ventilation I have allowed about $200.

"Mr. LESSLER. Does that include all the tanks necessary for the storage of the air?

"Admiral BOWLES. No.

"Mr. LESSLER. The torpedo apparatus?

"Admiral BOWLES. For the torpedo tube and gear I have allowed $1,100.

"The CHAIRMAN. What are the other pieces of machinery that you have estimated on in a general way?

"Admiral BOWLES. The next largest item that I have not covered in my testimony are the flooding and pumping arrangements, the air-compressing gear, flasks, and piping, amounting to about $13,000. Those are the principal items of the cost of the boat.

"The CHAIRMAN. Would you have any trouble in building this boat in a Government navy-yard, do you think?

"Admiral BOWLES. None whatever.

"The CHAIRMAN. I want to ask you whether the machinery in this boat is or is not merchandisable articles?

"Admiral BOWLES. All the principal machinery can be purchased in the open market.

"The CHAIRMAN. You can go out and buy them in the open market?

"Admiral BOWLES. Yes, sir.

"Mr. RIXEY. Ask him whether he could build the boat without infringing on any patents.

"Admiral BOWLES. It might require a little manipulation. What I mean is this: Every principle that is involved in the building of the submarine boat and its operation is well known. The patents upon the Holland submarine boat are upon detailed methods of accomplishing certain particular things. Now, then, if we do not do those in those particular ways we do not infringe upon their patents.

"Mr. DAYTON. Can they be done in other ways?

"Admiral BOWLES. They can be done in other ways."

At the time Rear-Admiral Bowles made the foregoing statements as to the cost of submarines, he was Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair of the Navy Department, and necessarily had much to do with the construction of crafts of this character. At the present time he is in charge of the construction work, etc., of the Fore River Shipbuilding Company, the builders of the Holland type of submarines. That he is authority on matters of cost of construction there is no doubt, otherwise a shipbuilding company as large as the one with which he is employed would not intrust their building to him.

Therefore, basing calculations upon the figures which Admiral Bowles states would give "a handsome profit" to the builders of the Holland boats; namely, $89,459 for a 120-ton boat, or $745.45 per ton—it will readily be seen by the following comparative statement that there has been an extra handsome profit of $1,519,738.58 since the United States contracted for the first Holland, the Plunger, in March, 1899.

Boat.	Tons.	Cost per boat.	Cost per ton.	Excess over $745.45 per ton.	Total excess profit per boat on a basis of $745.45 per ton.

This brings us up to the proposed submarine legislation as passed upon the House Committee on Naval Affairs, namely:

"The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to contract for eight submarine torpedo boats, in an amount not exceeding in the aggregate $3,500,000, and the sum of one million is hereby appropriated toward said purpose, and to remain available until expended: Provided, That all such boats shall be of the same type heretofore determined to be the superior, as the result of the competitive tests held under the provision of the naval appropriation act approved June 29, 1906, and March 2, 1907, unless on or before October 1, 1908, a submarine boat of a different type and of full size for naval warfare shall have been constructed and submitted to the Navy Department for like trial and by such like trial by said Department demonstrated to be not inferior to the best submarine torpedo boat in the competitive competition above referred to."

Computing the excessive profit to the Electric Boat Company from the proposed legislation, as above quoted, on Admiral Bowles's figures, we have:

Eight submarines of the Octopus type at a cost of $3,500,000, which means a unit cost of $437,500 for a 340-ton boat, or $1,286 per ton. Deducting from this proposed price the price per ton ($745) recommended by Admiral Bowles, who, as I have stated, is the builder of these boats, and it is seen that the Government would be paying an excessive profit of $541 per ton. In other words, the excessive profit on these eight boats of 340 tons each would be $1,471,520.

It can be readily shown, I think, by the testimony of Admiral Capps, the present Chief Constructor of the Navy Department, if the committee desires to go into the matter of cost of submarines, that the cost to construct these boats does not hold good per ton as the size of the boat is increased; that is to say, any naval expert will testify that the cost per ton decreases in an increasing ratio as the size and tonnage of the boats are increased. For instance, a 200-ton boat would cost per ton considerable more than a 250-ton boat, and a 300, 350, 400, 450, or 500 ton boat would decrease in cost per ton in a continuing and accelerating ratio.

I submit a comparative statement of the bids submitted by the Electric Boat Company and the Lake Torpedo Boat Company for the construction of submarines on April 30, 1907, from which it appears that the submarines to be constructed by the Electric Boat Company are to cost on an average of about $320 per ton more than the prices offered by the Lake Torpedo Boat Company under guarantees required by the Navy Department and subject to the performances of all tests prescribed or to be prescribed by the Navy Department as a condition precedent to their acceptance. By this statement it will also be seen that the lowest price of the Lake Torpedo Boat Company is $800 per ton, which approaches very closely the price given by Admiral Bowles.

The foregoing, as well as the following statement of the public press, show clearly that these boats have been most expensive instruments in warfare without rendering or demonstrating any practical value in return.

[Army and Navy Register, March 14, 1908.]

The report of the performance of the three submarines on the trip from New York to Annapolis has led to some question whether the 11-inch cylinder gasoline engines, supposed to be the largest afloat, with which the boats are equipped, are fitted for such work as they are called upon to do as the motive power of this type of vessel. They are suited for light work, such as running out from a dock and back again. The commanding officers of the Viper, Cuttlefish, and Tarantula will make special reports on this subject, and it is expected that the Navy Department will decide that certain changes should be made before similar engines are installed in the boats contracted for.

This article indicates that the boats are only suited for light work, and that they are having much trouble with their engines, etc.

"SUBMARINES ARE USELESS"—SIGSBEE.—REAR-ADMIRAL ALSO DECLARES THAT AIR SHIPS AS ENGINES OF BATTLE ARE ONLY A DREAM.

Baltimore, Tuesday.—That the submarine torpedo boat is only a scarecrow, that battles among air ships in mid-air is a dream, and that every war benefits nations were the ideas expressed by Rear-Admiral Charles D. Sigsbee to-day.

"The submarine," said the Admiral, "is a vessel of opportunity. There may be a time when it will be a powerful engine of warfare, but you will notice that as rapidly as some new method of attack is invented a new method of defense is ready to oppose it.

"For the present nothing is to be feared from or hoped for the submarine. It is a vessel which must sneak up under cover of night, and even then its bubbles can be seen and its course detected so accurately that it is small matter to avoid it.

"I was eight days and eight nights before Santiago, and was not attacked by the torpedoes, and later, when I was attacked, our guns simply sank them and killed eight of the crew, while the rest had a hard time getting ashore with the wreck. No, it must not be assumed in developing an engine of attack that the other fellow is not in the tower. I never slept before Santiago."

"That the submarine torpedo boat is only a scarecrow." "That the submarine is a vessel of opportunity." "That at the present time nothing is to be feared or hoped from the submarine."

[Army and Navy Journal, March 14, 1908.]

The engines for the submarine Octopus will soon be completed, and it will not be long now before the boat will be turned over to the Navy Department and placed in commission. While this boat is the standard boat of her type, she has been unfortunate, and the Cuttlefish and Viper, which were begun after she was laid down, have been in commission six months. The Octopus during her acceptance trials at Newport last July sunk and her crew lost control of her, and at one time thought their lives were lost. In trying to get her up the engines were practically ruined. By means of the compressed-air apparatus the boat was got to the surface and a terrible catastrophe was avoided in the nick of time. The Octopus had, previous to this adventure, competed in the contest with the Lake boat for the $3,000,000 hung up by Congress to be awarded in contracts to the company having the winning boat. It was on the result of this contest that the proposition was advanced in the House Naval Committee to give contracts for submarines to the makers of the Octopus, without competition by any other concern.

UNCLE SAM'S SUBMARINES AND THEIR DERRICKS.

We note with more or less interest a Washington dispatch which announces that special precautions are to be taken for the safety of the submarine boats now in the Navy, which practical men have come to believe are a menace to the men who handle them. For instance, we are told that "not only will there be with them at their maneuvers a tender, equipped with a powerful derrick and booms for lifting a disabled submarine to the surface, but it is purposed to furnish each submarine with a floating signal, arranged with a spool of light wire carried on the outside of the submarine shell and connected with the interior so that in time of disaster the imprisoned persons may release the floating signal, which will appear on the surface of the water and indicate that the submarine is in distress."

"It has been pointed out," continues the dispatch, "by an expert that a submarine might really be unable to get to the surface, and that by the nature of the exercises no one would be aware of the fact until it was too late to render assistance." We fail to see why it required expert knowledge to arrive at a conclusion established by more than one horrible and soul-sickening catastrophe on the other side of the ocean, and which might have been duplicated here but for the fact that the Navy's submarines have been towed from place to place and have seen very little real service under everyday conditions.

There is evidently something radically wrong with the submarine which requires such elaborate and costly apparatus to prevent it from becoming a death trap even under ordinary conditions following a summer day's maneuvers. Would it have a tendency to encourage the men penned up in such a craft to know that their comrades above knew that they were helpless on the bottom of the sea? Would it have a tendency to encourage that confidence and esprit du corps which is so essential in the satisfactory handling of a war vessel or any other war contrivance?

It seems to us that this trifling with the submarine question has been carried far enough. It is becoming quite apparent that the Navy Department made an egregious blunder in its original selection of a submarine, and all this derrick and signal business is designed to hide the merits of the case and to bolster up and try to make practical a boat which is built on dangerous principles to begin with.

Now, the question is, What does Congress propose to do about the matter? It would be the rankest sort of stupidity to continue buying submarines which have demonstrated their unfitness for practical service and which must be reenforced by derricks and signals, and must always have a convoy close at hand to keep it from being more destructive than the guns of an enemy's ship.

In view of these facts it is surprising that the Navy Department should persistently attempt to shut out any competition which would have a tendency to show a better submarine. Does that mean a lobby and an ultimate submarine scandal as odoriferous and as disgusting as that which sent some Government officials of the Post-Office Department to the penitentiary?

If some Member of Congress could just erect a derrick which would lift the Navy Department out of its preconceived ideas of submarine affairs, a greater service would be performed than by any mechanical contrivance which simply would pull a submarine out of the mud.

A SUBMARINE EXPLOIT.

An Associated Press dispatch from Newport, R. I., gives interesting details of one of the latest exploits of a Government submarine boat. The story follows:

"The Government tug Mina was rammed to-day by the submarine torpedo boat Porpoise during the maneuvers in Coddington Cove and the tug was forced to run full speed for the shore to escape sinking.

"The Porpoise, Lieutenant Knowton, was making tests in the cove 4 miles above the city in Narragansett Bay, with the Mina acting as escort. The Porpoise, in coming to the surface at a good speed, struck the Mina on the starboard bow below the water line and stove a hole in her a few feet from the bow.

"The forward compartment filled with water, but Chief Boatswain Sullivan, who was commanding the tug, swung her around and headed for the shore, at the same time ringing for full speed. The tug's bow was well down when she grounded on the sandy beach. The Porpoise was not injured."

A peculiar and somewhat disconcerting feature of most of the active operations of the particular type of submarines now holding sway in the United States Navy is their tendency to sink ships with which they are supposed to be cooperating and to turn turtle and suffocate the men who man them.

Recently naval experts have recommended that each of the submarines be attended by a convoy fitted out with a derrick, so that if anything should happen to the diver it might be hauled to the surface of the water. The performance of the Porpoise suggests that it may be necessary to furnish each submarine with two derrick-equipped convoys, for if there is to be this remarkable uncertainty regarding the course to be taken by a submarine as it comes to the surface, we have no assurance that the attending ship will not be put out of commission at any time. Then, too, the shock of the impact might also put the submarine out of business, in which event there would be pressing necessity for the other convoy with its derrick and its lifeboats.

We trust that the Navy Department will take this matter under consideration, and that the steps necessary to secure the additional convoy and derrick will be taken at once. Of course that would involve a good deal of expense, but if we are bound to have the present type of submarine (despite its shortcomings and its manifest dangers) we must have the necessary safeguards to protect the lives of the submarine crew and the derrick tenders. Besides, what is a little matter of money when it comes to hiding the bad judgment of the men who have been deciding these submarine issues according to their own sweet wills? It would be easier for them to provide the extra convoys and derricks than to admit that they have made a mistake. The taxpayers, however, may some day take a different view of the matter.

JAPAN IN YEAR WILL BE READY FOR THE WORLD—SO SAYS JOHN P. HOLLAND, WHO COACHED HER ENGINEER IN SUBMARINE BUILDING—NEW CRAFT MARVELS—"WILL GO ANYWHERE A FLEET CAN, AND STRONG ENOUGH TO SMASH EVANS."

John P. Holland found time to-day to sound a note of warning to the warring members of the Naval Committee at Washington and to Uncle Sam regarding the prospects of a sea fight in which our submarines may figure. He said:

"All submarines in use to-day are copies of my original boat, many of them poor apologies. The submarine fleet of the United States would be utterly useless outside of breaking a harbor blockade. They could not follow a fleet, like those which Japan is turning out every day.

"Japan has incomparably more superior submarine war men than we have. Mr. Matsu Kata, her national engineer, spent a year with me, daily learning the devices and secrets of the Holland. He returned to his country when no breath of hostility stirred the air. Unlike most peoples, the Japs work independently and indefatigably. They are building boats designed and fitted to accompany a fleet in any kind of weather for any distance and at any speed. Think of that! Admiral Evans's vast fleet would be blown from the seas with such submarine craft against him.

"Our boats can not travel with a fleet, and they can not venture from a port. Japan's boats work; they don't do stunts. Our submarines, I'm sorry to say, are now a joke. My patterns have been subjected to the treatment of young, inexperienced engineers, who professed to know more about problems I had battled with for years, and ruined.

"It is amazing how the United States Government can spend millions for submarines, and then get really nothing compared to what skillful Japanese engineers are building for their country.

"I am not wealthy, but I manage to keep the wolf from the door. I once had one-half of 1 per cent in the Electric Boat Company and the company which bears my name, but the promoters, men of great wealth, figured that some little schoolboy engineer could produce results with the product of my years of toil, and I was left in the cold.

"The American people are beginning to see the strangely unpatriotic heart which beats in the breast of a corporation. Uncle Sam is the victim, not I. I created a war weapon which, under my care and improvement, would have eclipsed any destructive machine in the world. England tried to improve on my plans and lost three submarine crews and three boats."

Mr. Holland, the inventor of the submarines, now in the service of the United States, and which boats bear his name, states in the above:

"Our submarines, I'm sorry to say, are now a joke. My patterns have been subjected to the treatment of young, inexperienced engineers, who profess to know more about problems I had battled with for years, and ruined."

[Army and Navy Journal, October 26, 1907.]

The Navy Department has not yet accepted the submarine Octopus, and some curiosity is shown as to cause for delay, as other boats built by her makers since this boat was completed have been accepted. Department officials explain that during the tests at Newport last spring an accident occurred to the machinery of the Octopus, and she went to the bottom and stayed there until by using the compressed-air apparatus the boat came up. As the engines were injured in the attempt to raise the boat on the occasion referred to, there has been delay in accepting her.

SUBMARINES POOR, SAYS MR. HOLLAND—INVENTOR CALLS LATEST CRAFT OF ELECTRIC BOAT COMPANY "WORTHLESS"—WOULD STOP BUILDING—SAYS GOVERNMENT SHOULD CONSTRUCT NO MORE, AS THEY ARE "UNNECESSARY EXPENDITURE"—DENIAL OF ISAAC L. RICE—TAKES ISSUE WITH WASHINGTON REPORTS ON THE LESSLER INVESTIGATION BEFORE CONGRESS.

John P. Holland, inventor of the original Holland submarine boat, said yesterday at his home, in Orange, N. J., that he had no knowledge whatever concerning developments in connection with the building of submarine boats for the United States Government. He said that up to April 1, 1904, he had been consulting engineer of the Electric Boat Company, but since then had had nothing to do with that company. He did not want his name used in connection with submarines recently completed or being built, as they did not represent his patents or conform with his original plans.

"If I were placed on the witness stand before a naval investigating committee at Washington," said Mr. Holland, "I would urge that no more submarine boats be built like those that have recently been constructed. To my mind they are worthless as defensive boats, and therefore an unnecessary expenditure. What the people of the Pacific coast are thinking about when, as is reported, they petition for submarine boats I do not understand. Submarines can never effectually defend any coast, as is understood by naval authorities."

Mr. Holland said he saw Baron Matsu Kata last September and again in October, and that the Baron told him that the boats were being built at Kobe, but would not say how many were being constructed. He was given to understand, however, that a big flotilla was being built. Mr. Holland said that these boats would be able to cross the Pacific at a greater speed than Admiral Evans's fleet was now making and would be able to accompany any fleet of battle ships on any cruise. The submarine, Mr. Holland said, was no defense against a submarine and could be used only as a defense against a battle-ship fleet or to attack a battle-ship fleet or land defenses.

Isaac L. Rice, president of the Electric Boat Company, was desirous of getting his side of the alleged bribery in Washington before the public and asked to be allowed to explain the Lessler matter. To a Herald reporter he said:

"In connection with the Representative Montague Lessler matter, I desire to say it was disposed of completely by a very exhaustive examination made by Congress, covering 270 printed pages from House of Representatives Report 3482, Fifty-seventh Congress, second session.

"Your Washington correspondent says in yesterday's issue that 'Lessler came out of the investigation with flying colors, yet the committee reported there was no reliable evidence of corruption.'

"This matter being nearly five years old, and your correspondent probably not having the report before him, I think it only proper to say that any use of the word 'reliable' is not accurate.

"The actual language of the unanimous report was as follows: 'That there is no evidence to sustain the charge of an attempt by the Holland Submarine Boat Company or any of its agents to corruptly influence a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs respecting proposed legislation before said committee and the House.'"

EVANS LAUGHS AT SUBMARINES—"FIGHTING BOB" SAYS UNITED STATES NAVY IS BEST IN WORLD—FIRES BROADSIDE OF TALK AT REPORTER—36,000 MEN IN SERVICE ARE NOT ENOUGH FOR SHIPS NOW BUILT.

"Fighting Bob" Evans anchored in Chicago yesterday, and here are some of his ideas:

The principal use of the submarine is to frighten nervous people.
Our Navy is third in size and first in excellence.
If we had a war, we would have to recruit fast.
The battle ship is the backbone of the Navy.
Our traditions are the soul of the Navy.
We need a general staff.
Avast lubber! Fighting Bob Evans is in town.

No; that hitch in his leg is not a sea hitch. It came from a wound received while storming Fort Fisher. He strode the deck at the Virginia Hotel yesterday and piped the Navy for fair. "Piped" is a seagoing word.

It lacked two bells of the time for the dinner flag to go to the masthead at the hotel when the admiral saw a reporter salute the quarterdeck and come aboard. Here is what he said:

"The American Navy ranks third in point of size, but in point of excellence it comes first.

"There is no longer any difficulty in getting first-class men to man ships. If we had a war, however, we would have to do some fast recruiting. Before the Spanish-American war 96 per cent of the Navy was foreign born; now the percentage is exactly reversed.

THIRTY-SIX THOUSAND MEN NOT ENOUGH.

"We have at present 36,000 enlisted men in the service. The number is not sufficient to man the ships that are already built.

"The naval reserve is to the Navy what the National Guard is to the Army, and the naval reserves compares very favorably with the National Guard in organization and in discipline. Its object is to man the auxiliary cruisers in time of war, although it could be used to reenforce the crews of the regular ships.

"I do not see how the present large naval establishment can be managed without the organization of a general staff. We have none at present, but we could not successfully manage a war without one.

"We learned many things from the Japanese-Russian war. However valuable these lessons were, they did not materially alter the theories that have been previously held by naval men.

"They demonstrated beyond a doubt that the battle ship is the backbone of the Navy, and that no number of cruisers, however well handled or fleet, can possibly take the place of the battle ship. The limit in size of the battle ships has been reached, and I do not believe that anything larger than a 20,000-ton vessel will ever be designed for the Navy.

SUBMARINE AN EXPERIMENT.

"The submarine is principally good to frighten nervous people. It has not passed beyond the stage of experiment. The moral effect of these little fellows in war would undoubtedly be great, but their destructive power is yet to be shown.

"Everything has changed in the Navy since I entered it except seamanship, gunnery, and the traditions of the Navy. I came in forty-six years ago. Our traditions are the soul of the Navy. If our crews did not have the courage and the loyalty that animated the crews of the Bonhomme Richard and the Constitution, the most powerful ships and the most improved armament would not avail us anything."

SUBMARINES DO NOT GO OUT—WOULD JUST AS SOON HAVE CALMER SEAS FOR TRIP TO ANNAPOLIS.

The submarines Tarantula, Cuttlefish, and Viper, although it is their habit to navigate the depths far from superficial agitation, did not care to venture out into the southeast gale that was wrinkling the surface of the sea yesterday. They were scheduled to start in the morning, accompanied by the gunboat Hist, for Annapolis, on the longest ocean trip ever attempted by craft of their class. The distance, including more than 100 miles of the comparatively quiescent waters of Chesapeake Bay, is 420 nautical miles. Lieut. C. E. Courtney, in charge of the Hist, commands the expedition. The twelve men on each of the little ships are mostly machinists and electricians. Lieut. J. F. Daniels commands the Tarantula, Lieut. D. C. Bingham the Viper, and Lieut. E. J. Marquart the Cuttlefish. The submarines are not intended to be storm defiers and that is why Lieutenant Courtney decided to hold them in port until the weather was favorable to test their long-distance capacity. They may not start for Annapolis until to-morrow.

[New York Sun, February 7, 1908.]

SUBMARINES MAKE A START—AND THEN COME BACK AGAIN, FINDING THE SEA TOO ROUGH.

The submarines Tarantula, Cuttlefish, and Viper, preceded by the gunboat Hist, flagship of the expedition, bound for Annapolis on the longest trip ever attempted by vessels of their class, made a start for the open yesterday evening. It was the intention to send them away last Saturday, when there was a gale afloat, but Lieut. C. E. Courtney, who commands the Hist and is the admiral of the squadron, decided that they could not do the trick in bad weather.

The little ships left the navy-yard yesterday afternoon after maneuvering in the upper bay to see that everything worked shipshape. They headed seaward, passing out at Sandy Hook in a single column, with the Hist leading, at 6.05 o'clock. The marine observer at the Hook thought they were off, but they were not. He did not see them again, but Quarantine reported them passing in to anchorage off Tompkinsville at 8.50. Lieutenant Courtney had found very rough weather outside, although it looked placid enough in the lower bay when he headed seaward. He so informed by wireless Rear-Admiral Goodrich, in command at the navy-yard.

Will an attacking hostile fleet wait for fair weather? Of what use can these fair-weather boats be in an engagement fought through storm? Of what moral effect, even, would such boats have when all experts acquainted with our submarines know that about all they have proven is their weakness?

SUBMARINES GO INTO DRY DOCK—THE ICE HAS PLAYED THE MISCHIEF WITH THE LIGHT-WEIGHT PROPELLERS.

The lookouts at Cape Henry may have to wait a long time before they get a glimpse of the submarine boats Cuttlefish, Tarantula, and Viper, which a dispatch from Norfolk published yesterday said had not entered the Chesapeake. The three little war ships were put in dry dock yesterday in the navy-yard at Brooklyn to have their twisted propellers straightened out.

They were scheduled to sail ten days ago for Annapolis, but a storm that stirred the coastwise course into unwonted turmoil kept them in. They sailed from the navy-yard on Thursday, and after maneuvering in the upper bay headed for the open, preceded by the gunboat Hist, flagship of the squadron, commanded by Lieut. C. E. Courtney. They got outside the Hook, where it was found that one of the submarines had a twisted propeller blade and that the rest would have to accommodate their speed to that of the damaged ship if it was decided to make the trip. Besides this, the sea outside was a bit lumpy.

Now, one of the objects of the 400-mile trip is to create a speed record for craft of the diving sort, and as that would have been impossible with a disabled vessel, Lieutenant Courtney put back and anchored off Tompkinsville. He found lots of ice there in the next turn of the tide seaward, and it played the deuce with the squadron's propellers, which were not made to battle with arctic seas. He had to call for a tug from the navy-yard to help cut a lane for the submarines through the ice. They were towed to the yard and had more trouble with the ice in making dock.

It was suggested that the submarines might have avoided the ice by plunging under it; but that, the experts said, was impracticable in a crowded harbor like New York, and outside the harbor they do not have to dive, as there is no ice worth mentioning a few miles offshore. Going up the Chesapeake at this season the boats are likely to encounter about as much, if not more, ice than they met down the bay. The ice is sometimes so heavy in the Chesapeake that ice breakers, specially constructed steamers heavily shod with steel, are used to keep navigation open. It looks now as if the trip of the submarines will be postponed until there is a breaking up of the ice—which may not come for several weeks—in this harbor.

Each of the little ships is 93 feet long over all, has a displacement of 175 tons, and carries four Whitehead torpedoes.

CRUISER TO AID SUBMARINE—DES MOINES SENT TO FREE HIST AND VIPER, STUCK IN CHESAPEAKE BAY.

WASHINGTON, February 20, 1908.

Capt. Charles J. Badger, superintendent of the Naval Academy at Annapolis, Md., telephoned to the Navy Department to-day that the gunboat Hist, which is the tender to the flotilla of submarines which left New York last Sunday afternoon, is aground on Cove Point in Chesapeake Bay, about 40 miles below Annapolis, at the mouth of the Patuxent River. The submarine Viper, he said, is also aground seven miles below the Naval Academy. The submarines Tarantula and Cuttlefish are standing by the Viper.

The torpedo boat Bagley, Captain Badger, is said to have gone to the aid of the Viper, and the tug Standish left Annapolis yesterday to aid the Hist.

It was decided at the Navy Department late this afternoon to send the cruiser Des Moines, now at Hampton Roads, to the aid of the Hist and the Viper. The Des Moines will probably arrive early to-morrow morning and the little vessels will be hauled off without difficulty.

A telephone message was received at the Department to-day from Lieut. Charles E. Courtney, in command of the flotilla, saying that the submarines had good weather and made fair speed from the time they left New York Bay until the mouth of the Chesapeake Bay was reached. Upon entering the bay, he added, ice was encountered and there was a heavy snowstorm accompanied by thick weather. The Hist was driven ashore and the submarines endeavored to make the remainder of the trip to Annapolis without the tender. On their way up the bay the Viper ran ashore on account of a confusion of light-houses.

[Army and Navy Journal, January 20, 1906.]

Rear-Admiral Joseph B. Coghlan, United States Navy, in the course of an address before the Patria Club, of New York, on the evening of January 12, discussed the subject of naval expansion with the same vigor and frankness which have characterized his remarks on the same question on other recent occasions. He declared that while on paper the United States Navy in 1908 would be second in point of strength, yet if vessels now practically obsolete were stricken from the active list, the United States would rank only fifth or sixth among the naval powers of the world. Admiral Coghlan's views on the question of ship types were equally interesting. "There is," he said, "but one kind of fighting ship, and that is the speedy battle ship of the line. All other designs are doubtful quantities. Following the fads of various persons, we find among our twenty-seven fighting ships some millions of dollars wasted on four monitors. In the harbor of Manila I have seen one of them rolling twenty times a minute trying to hit something with a 12-inch gun—much as I have seen a woman trying to hit a hen with a stone. Three submarine ships came to the navy-yard last spring for repairs. Heaven only knows when they will get away. As soon as you repair one end of a craft the other end needs rebuilding. The insides have been wholly rebuilt, and the only thing I can see to do with them is to build new hulls. I shall object to doing that, however, when the subject comes up for consideration. I prefer to let them sink where they are. The battle ship is the ideal sea fighter, because it has the power of protection and the ability to carry its weapons within striking distance. But I consider the modern torpedo boat as the most deadly form of marine craft. I believe that there can be no final type of war vessel; we must always build—always keep repairing and realize that an up-to-date country should not only keep abreast of the times, but a little bit ahead. I believe that we should not follow too closely European standards in the construction of our battle ships. You will be surprised to know how quickly a ship becomes antiquated. Even now Dewey's ship Olympia would need a great amount of repairs to bring it up to date. The only man who ever can revolutionize war is He who will abolish it, and we are waiting for His second coming." Admiral Coghlan's remarks on the Naval Militia were equally to the point. He said: "It is often said that a few months will get our men into good shape. Yes; but where is the enemy who will give us even those few months? For such a one we will not need preparation. Some are trying to partly solve the problem by the idea of a naval militia. This may give us a few men, but they will be mostly men whose mode of life does not give them the stamina—physical, of course—to stand the strain and hardships. Even the best of these lack the 'sea habit' which would keep them good men during their first few weeks at sea. And so we are driven to the inevitable conclusion that our recruits in war must come from our deep-sea vessels—vessels engaged in foreign commerce.

"Three submarine ships came to the navy-yard last spring for repairs. Heaven only knows when they will get away. As soon as you repair one end of the craft the other end needs rebuilding. The insides have been wholly rebuilt, and the only thing I can see to do with them is to build new hulls."

The foregoing facts and conditions influenced me to introduce House resolution No. 264, and it is believed that an official statement of the facts asked for therein would go a great way to disabuse the illusions in the mind of the Electric Boat Company and their agents and representatives, technical and nontechnical, as to the practical merits of the boats they claim are so good.

Whereas, first, the following statements have been published in the public press: "It can be readily seen that the programme of the House committee at this session proposes to pay at least $1,286 per ton for the submarines, against a reasonable price named by Mr. Bowles of $745.40 per ton, or $1,476,296.60 more than the present builder said they were worth when he testified before the committee in 1902." Also: "It developed to-day that on the seven Holland submarines commissioned in 1903, at a cost of $1,190,000, the sum of $439,119.09 has been expended in the last four years in maintenance and repairs. Of this amount three vessels alone have taken most of the appropriation. It is further ascertained that the Grampus and Pike, at Mare Island Navy-Yard, are now laid up, never having worked to the entire satisfaction of the Department, while Congress has just been asked to appropriate the following sums for repairs in addition to materials already purchased: The Adder, $24,500; the Grampus, $33,500; the Moccasin, $38,500; the Pike, $33,500. Must keep contracts secret. An investigation of the contracts under which the submarines are purchased by the Government shows there is a confidential paragraph in each contract by which the Government is bound not to reveal any data concerning plans, specifications, models, weight records, speed records, or any other information without specific authority from the manufacturers. In contrast to this secrecy, it is pointed out that millions of dollars of battle ships have been built and their performances and other data are duly chronicled in the Annual Register of the Navy Department." Also: "The trip of the submarine flotilla made up of the Cuttlefish, Viper, and Tarantula, and accompanied by the gunboat Hist, from New York to Annapolis Naval Academy has proved somewhat disappointing to naval officials." Also: "The Octopus is still in the shipbuilding yard having her engines, which were practically ruined in an accident during the acceptance tests here last spring, rebuilt;" and

Whereas, second, secret Government contracting is against public policy and the specific provisions of the Revised Statutes, sections 512, 515, 3744, 3745, which provide that papers on file may be examined by any person desiring to do so, and that copies thereof shall be furnished upon certain fees: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to inform the House of Representatives whether $745.45 per ton is a reasonable price for Octopus type of submarines; what price per ton is being paid for Octopus type of submarines; whether the sum of $3,500,000 is excessive for eight Octopus type of submarines; what repairs have been made on each submarine—why, when, where, and with what results; how many days each submarine has been in active commission; how many days each submarine has been out of commission, and why; what accidents each submarine has had, the nature thereof and causes thereof; what contracts have been made for submarines; what prices have been paid per ton for each submarine built or contracted for; what submarines are available for use; what submarines are not available for use, and why; and to transmit to the House of Representatives verbatim copies of everything on file in the Navy Department relating to submarine boats, with the exception of detailed plans thereof, but not excepting reports relating to the performance of each submarine, accidents thereto, repairs thereon, and condition thereof, and the specifications thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. LILLEY has also filed with the committee to be incorporated in the record the affidavit of one Clement E. Adams, of Bridgeport, Conn., relating to an article or articles printed by one J. F. C. Archibald, setting forth in this affidavit that Archibald told him the article was prepared at the request of one Lawrence Y. Spear.

At the suggestion of Mr. LILLEY this will be incorporated in the record in full, and any weight or importance attached to it in the way of evidence to be determined upon an examination of the person making it if it is deemed necessary.

BRIDGEPORT, March 16, 1908.

STATE OF CONNECTICUT, County of Fairfield, ss:

Clement E. Adams, being duly sworn, doth depose and say that he resides in said Bridgeport and that in the summer of 1906 he was engaged in business in the city of Washington, and that during said summer of 1906 one J. F. C. Archibald came to him, the said Clement E. Adams, and represented that he, the said J. F. C. Archibald, was a war correspondent for Collier's Weekly and that he had been appointed by the President of the United States to visit certain cities and towns upon the Pacific coast of the United States to investigate and report to the President of the United States upon the condition of the coast defenses of the Pacific coast of the United States, and later he, the said J. F. C. Archibald, said to the deponent that he, the said J. F. C. Archibald, had visited certain cities and towns upon the Pacific coast of the United States and had reported thereon to the President of the United States, and that he, the said J. F. C. Archibald, had appeared before certain chambers of commerce, boards of trade, and other associations of business men and citizens in various cities and towns in States upon the Pacific coast and had addressed them, the said chambers of commerce, boards of trade, and associations of business men and citizens, upon the advantages to be gained by the States bordering upon the Pacific coast and the citizens of said States by the purchase by the United States Government of submarine torpedo boats, and that certain petitions and addresses made to Congress and the Members thereof by said chambers of commerce, boards of trade, and associations of business men and citizens in said cities and towns in States bordering upon the Pacific coast were caused by the work and efforts of him, the said J. F. C. Archibald, as aforesaid, and at a later time said deponent showed to the said J. F. C. Archibald a newspaper article on the subject of submarine torpedo boats wherein the Lake submarine torpedo boat was criticised, and the said J. F. C. Archibald said to deponent that he, the said J. F. C. Archibald, was the author of said newspaper article and did write the same, and that the criticism of the Lake submarine torpedo boat therein contained was incited and caused by the request to him, the said J. F. C. Archibald, made by one Lawrence Y. Spear, an officer of the Electric Boat Company, and that said request of the said Lawrence Y. Spear, made to him, the said J. F. C. Archibald, was by him, the said J. F. C. Archibald, acceded to because he, the said J. F. C. Archibald, was under obligations to the said Lawrence Y. Spear and the said Electric Boat Company.

CLEMENT E. ADAMS.

Subscribed and sworn to on this 16th day of March, A. D. 1908, before me.

[SEAL.] CARL FOSTER, Notary Public.

The CHAIRMAN. Also a letter from Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States, saying that he received a letter from Mr. Archibald. The clerk will read the letter in full and incorporate it in the proceedings.

(The letter referred to is as follows:)

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, March 18, 1908.

MY DEAR MR. LILLEY: Referring to our conversation of this morning, Mr. Archibald never was appointed or employed by me, nor, so far as I know, was he ever appointed or employed by anyone else connected with the Administration. Some time about a year ago he came in and saw me for about two minutes and said that he was going to make an investigation of the question of submarine defense on the Pacific, especially, I believe, in reference to Puget Sound; and that he was immensely interested in the subject, having been a war correspondent for various papers, and that he would like to send me a report of what he found. I answered him that of course I should be very glad to receive such a report from him or any other man who might investigate the subject. He sent me a letter on the subject some weeks later, which I transmitted to the Secretary of the Navy. I have transmitted dozens of similar letters from men who have told me of investigations that they had made or of facts they had found or of suggestions which they believed were important. It is the usual course; it was followed in this instance exactly as in all similar cases.

Sincerely, yours,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

HON. GEORGE L. LILLEY,
House of Representatives.

If Congress insists that we have got to have submarines, let us build them in our own yards and do away with these subterranean methods that have pertained to submarine legislation. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

I yield back the balance of my time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DAWSON].

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, we have to-day heard the ablest and most eloquent speech, perhaps, that ever was delivered in this House in favor of an extraordinary increase in the Navy. I do not believe that I can add anything to the very able answers that have already been made to its argument. No American in a case of necessity would stand back upon expense, but every American ought to take a common-sense view of every proposition, and the matter of expense is one of the things to be considered. The two battle ships carried in this naval bill will cost, in my judgment, $11,000,000 apiece in order to put them in the sea in fighting condition. They will cost annually, probably, $1,000,000 apiece thereafter for maintenance. The cost of these two ships—$22,000,000—would build 440 public buildings in our smaller cities at $50,000 apiece. We expend to-day on our Army and Navy, carried in the naval and military appropriation bills, more money than the 500,000 public school teachers, who teach 12,000,000 children, receive as their compensation. So it seems that the item of expense ought to be considered, although it ought not to be a dominating consideration.

To-day we have a navy that is seven and one-half times as large as our navy was when we declared war with Spain ten years ago. Also we have a navy that is nearly ten times as large as we had when President Cleveland sent his famous Venezuelan message. It is idle for gentlemen to tell us that a larger navy is essential to the preservation of the Monroe doctrine. We have preserved that doctrine for a hundred years nearly. That doctrine is grounded upon right, upon principle, and its correctness is its strength. Why, Mr. Chairman, what would the world have thought of this country twelve years ago if this Venezuelan message, which thrilled every diplomatic circle in the world, had been withheld on account of our small Navy compared with the navies of Europe, and especially with the navy of England, which would confront us in an emergency growing out of its subject-matter?

The history of the country shows conclusively that an immense navy is not essential to the preservation of the Monroe doctrine, for we have not heretofore had such a navy, either actually or relatively, when compared with the navies of Europe.

It strikes me that the error in the argument in favor of an immense increase consists in two or three matters. First, there is an assumption that as we are to-day the armies of Europe or of Asia could be landed on our shores. In my judgment, not a nation in the world or all the nations of Europe combined could land an army here. Our coast and harbor defenses, our submarines, our Regular Army, and our National Guard would prevent such an event. Mr. Chairman, submarines constitute the cheapest and most effective defense a nation can have, and we have to-day very few of them, compared with France and England. For the cost of two such battle ships as are authorized in this bill we could probably construct fifty submarines, which would probably protect, in addition to our present defenses, perfectly every harbor of the old United States as we were ten years ago.

There is no danger of war with England. The cotton fields of the South will guarantee peace with Great Britain. The grain fields of the West, and our beef and pork, and our hundreds of millions of dollars of commerce between England and the United States add additional guaranties of peace between England and the United States. Three thousand miles of Canadian border constitute that Dominion a perpetual hostage against English hostility. So, as has been repeatedly admitted by gentlemen on the other side of this House, when considering the Navy you can safely eliminate the possibility of war with England.

We already have a Navy better and stronger than any other European country. Another error in the gentleman's brilliant and earnest argument is the presumption apparent between its lines that the Japanese have some sinister purposes against us. Why should any country in the world want the United States? If they should take us to-day, they could not hold us to-morrow. The balance of the world could not subjugate the eighty or ninety millions of American citizens. It would not pay them to undertake it. It could not be profitable to hold our brave, resourceful, and liberty-loving people, even if it were possible. Do they merely want war for the sake of a fight? We have a Navy 60 or 70 per cent stronger than that of Japan. Is there any evidence, however, that Japan has any hostile intentions against us. I submit there is not. I am not an apologist for the conduct of Japan——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question for my information?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I am very much interested in this discussion. The gentleman says we have a navy 60 or 70 per cent stronger than the navy of Japan. I understood the statement of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] this morning to be that Japan's navy is stronger than ours in the Pacific to-day, with all of our fleet there.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will consult the reports, he will see that the navy of Japan has 451,000 tons and that of the United States 771,000 tons.

I repeat, I am not an apologist of Japan, but I can easily see how, after a great war, in which hundreds of thousands of soldiers were engaged, when those soldiers were disbanded, they would desire and be compelled to seek homes and work. I can easily see how they would be attracted to Hawaii, without their going to that island in great numbers being considered a hostile act. Japan having recently added hundreds of thousands of square miles to her territory and millions of people to her Empire, having added thousands of miles to her coast line, having assumed greater responsibilities than she ever had before, I can see how she could increase her standing army and increase her navy without such increases being considered evidences of any hostile purpose against the United States.

And, as has been well said, in case of a war between Japan and America on account of the race question, there can be no reason to doubt that in such a conflict, for such a cause, the entire navies of Europe would fight on the side of America, because every European nation would know that if the Japs had undertaken to establish the supremacy of the yellow man throughout the world, our defeat, if you can imagine such a thing, would necessarily be followed by the defeat of one European nation after another. And so, if it is an unjust war upon us, and a war upon racial problems, then our knowledge of mankind must lead us to expect that every white race in the world would stand by the side of America against the yellow race in such a combat.

So I submit that the great reasons upon which the argument is based for an immense Navy are themselves in all probability baseless. And if you are going to suppose that England and Japan would ever join forces against us, if you are going to act upon such an improbable and almost impossible idea, why do you not go further and presume that there is probability of the entire balance of the world uniting against us, and then insist that we must have a Navy equal to the combined navies of the great powers of the earth? And again, if there is any imminent danger of a conflict between the yellow race and the white race, why limit your number of battle ships to four or even twelve? If the danger is imminent, if it is to be the policy that we are to have a Navy as large as England and Japan together, then we will require fifty more battle ships.

Why not declare that the policy is to have a navy equal to any two powers of the earth, and then go forward and adopt that programme? If you can satisfy the American people that there is any necessity, the American people will stand for it. We who think that this bill is liberal in providing for two battle ships are not against a great navy. We realize that our country ought to have a great navy. We insist that we do now have such a navy. We are in favor of every ship put upon the seas being the very best ship that skill and money can produce. We are in favor of it being manned by the best soldiers and the best officers. We are in favor of additional ships from time to time to keep up a strong, great navy of splendid matériel and personnel.

The difference between us and the other side, it seems to me, is that we have more faith in the greatness and spirit of our people. It is the spirit of our people itself which would forbid any country or all countries from desiring to subjugate us if they could, because no nation could hold the American people in subjection profitably, happily, or peacefully; nor could any nation in the world hold the fruits of a possible temporary victory over us in any quarter of the globe. It is not a question, it seems to me, of patriotism, but of judgment. We have confidence in the people and confidence in our position. We have confidence in the principles and traditions which have been preserved to us for a hundred years. We have confidence in our resources and skill in time of emergency.

Again, while the civilized peoples of the world, as shown in their private utterances and as shown by their official representatives, are preaching the doctrine of arbitration and expecting international agreements to preserve the peace of the world, why should the greatest power in the world, with the strongest peace sentiment, with the strongest conditions to justify it in taking the initiative toward positive settlements by arbitration—why should it at this late day in its history undertake to outstrip the nations of the earth in warlike preparations? Why should it not rather, following the spirit of its civilization, take the lead of all the nations of the earth in a movement that will tend to the neutral disarmament of the great powers, that will tend to relieve humanity of the burdens of war, not only humanity in our country, but throughout the world? Why not let us adopt a policy and let the world know that we have adopted a policy that means not merely a profession of the principles of peace, but will mean something practical in the direction of peace and disarmament itself? I am not in favor of one disarmament while other nations keep up their armament, but I am in favor of letting the world know by practice, as well as by precept, that we are opposed to increasing the burdens upon the workers of the world in order to maintain implements of war, and then we only burden our citizens according to our necessities. Implements of war encourage not only opportunities for trouble, but the disposition to find trouble. Nations are not altogether different from individuals.

You would not expect a man in a civilized community to have a Maxim gun in his front yard and to put armor plates around his dwelling. In the uncivilized state you might expect him to carry a gun. In the civilized state, when some danger is imminent, you might expect him to guard himself and carry weapons, but in a civilized state, with no danger threatened, you do not expect him to be carrying an arsenal. One who has weapons is more ready to give offense and is more ready to find offense than if unarmed. I heard a gentleman in the cloakroom remark just now that it has been stated in this debate that if we had had four more battle ships ten years ago than we had at that time we would not have had any war with Spain. His comment on that was that if we had had four less we might not have had any war with Spain. I doubt both statements. I believe that conditions in Cuba had been a menace, and there was hardly an American statesman who did not expect, sooner or later, trouble with Spain over Cuba. That was the last cause of trouble for us with European nations upon this continent. When Spain vacated Cuba and left the Caribbean Sea not another single probable cause of war with any European nation remained on the Western Hemisphere.

While, of course, there is always a possibility of war, there is no reasonable cause to expect trouble with any Asiatic power. You ought not to presume that a civilized nation, such as Japan is, certainly in her ruling classes, a nation that is aspiring to be one of the foremost nations of the earth, whose people are peacefully inclined, that is trying to develop a great internal commerce and enterprise—you must not expect such a nation to be anxious for war with any power, much less with the mightiest power on the face of the globe. I heard with a thrill in my heart the eloquent story of war as depicted by my friend from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON], and I heard him conclude it by saying that any man who had been in war is against war. I could not but think then that these great armies in Japan who had witnessed the same suffering my friend knew of and who had gone through the experiences he depicted, hundreds of thousands of them, under his theory are to-day evangels of peace in Japan and will throw their influence to withhold any warlike movement upon the part of that great country. [Applause.]

Mr. GILL. Mr. Chairman, some time has elapsed since the Secretary of the Navy transmitted to the House the letters, orders, and other papers relating to the appointment of Doctor Stokes to command the hospital ship Relief and to the resignation of Admiral Brownson as Chief of the Bureau of Navigation. The facts uncovered by this report should have impelled prompt and vigorous action on the part of the House, but this report still slumbers in the archives of a committee. Therefore, I feel called upon to direct the attention of the Members of the House to two matters shown therein: First, to the injustice done to the veterans of the Army and Navy in the unjust and unfair condemnation by the President of one of their comrades, Admiral Brownson; secondly, to the violation of our laws, that should be just as sacred and inviolable to the highest administrative officers of the Government as we expect them to be to the humblest of our citizens. We should demand justice and fair play, not only in precept, but also in practice; and that he who is loudest in preaching the "square deal" should be foremost in practicing it. We should demand administrative respect for the law. Administrative contempt for the law, Mr. Chairman, is not only inherently vicious, but if permitted to pass unnoticed and unchallenged, is bound to serve as a pernicious precedent for similar conduct in the future, and must exert a corrupting influence upon the whole body politic.

In his letter of the 2d of January, 1908, to Secretary Metcalf, President Roosevelt says:

> The action of the late Chief of the Bureau, Admiral Brownson, in tendering his resignation because he did not agree with the President and the Department regarding an order issued, before he came into the Bureau, by the Secretary of the Navy as to the control of the hospital ships was unseemly and improper. * * *

This reference by the President to an order alleged to have been issued prior to Admiral Brownson's appointment as Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, and as to which Admiral Brownson had disagreed with the President, has created the impression that Admiral Brownson has refused to obey this order. For this supposed refusal Admiral Brownson has been severely criticised in many quarters. As a matter of fact, no such order as is referred to by the President in this letter exists, unless it has been inadvertently or otherwise omitted from the letters, orders, and other papers sent to the House by Secretary Metcalf in answer to the request of the House for all the documents and papers bearing upon the appointment of Doctor Stokes and the resignation of Admiral Brownson as Chief of the Bureau of Navigation. That the President, in thus referring to an order, undoubtedly intended to specify the "indorsement" by Secretary Bonaparte on December 12, 1906, of the recommendations of the joint board of medical officers that naval surgeons should command naval hospital ships, is borne out by the statement in his letter of January 4 to Secretary Metcalf, in which he speaks of an order. But in calling this indorsement an order he was probably misled by seeing only one version of this indorsement—the one in which a vital paragraph was omitted. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that in Secreary Metcalf's letter to the House there are two versions of this indorsement—one on page 15 of this letter marked "Indorsement No. 9," which concludes with the following paragraph:

> No immediate action by the Department is deemed necessary in the premises, but its conclusions will be communicated to the bureaus interested and to the general board of medical officers.

On page 18 of Secretary Metcalf's letter to the House the second version appears, under the head of "Precedents."

From this indorsement of Secretary Bonaparte the paragraph just recited was omitted. The concluding paragraph of the original indorsement stating that no immediate action by the Department, on the recommendations of the joint board of medical officers, is deemed necessary, expressly characterizes Secretary Bonaparte's approval of these recommendations merely as an approval of policy, and is a distinct disavowal of any intention by the Department to take immediate action upon these recommendations. It, therefore, can in no sense be considered an order. Why this concluding paragraph was omitted from Secretary Bonaparte's indorsement as it appears on page 18 of Secretary Metcalf's letter I do not know. This omission, however, gives to Secretary Bonaparte's indorsement the color of an order rather than a declaration of what the Department proposed to do when the proper time arrived, and the proper time could arrive only when the President and the Secretary of the Navy were duly authorized to act upon these recommendations by Congress, as such action is clearly prohibited by existing law.

Admiral Brownson, then, did not disagree with the President as to any order concerning the appointment of surgeons to command naval hospital ships, and could not have refused, as many have supposed, to obey any order issued by the Secretary of the Navy before he was appointed Chief of the Bureau of Navigation. Indeed, so far as is shown by the letter of Secretary Metcalf no order was ever issued appointing surgeons to command naval hospital ships until Secretary Metcalf issued an order on December 30, 1907, appointing Doctor Stokes to command the Relief, six days after Admiral Brownson had resigned and his resignation had been accepted. Undoubtedly Admiral Brownson differed with the Secretary of the Navy and with the President as to the wisdom and legality of putting into execution the recommendations of the joint board of medical officers that surgeons be put in command of naval hospital ships. That he had an undoubted right to do. Nay, more. As the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, Admiral Brownson was the naval adviser of the Secretary of the Navy and of the President, and when he saw that this proposed policy appointing surgeons to command naval hospital ships was about to be put into execution, a course which he believed to be illegal, it was his duty to so advise the Secretary of the Navy and the President; and upon finding his advice rejected and finding himself out of harmony with his superiors he should have relieved them and himself, as he did, by resigning as Chief of the Bureau of Navigation. Could anyone expect a man possessing Admiral Brownson's firmness of character, devotion to duty, and exalted sense of honor to permit himself to be an instrument in the violation of the law which both he and his superiors have sworn to obey?

The honor and glory which Admiral Brownson has earned by forty-six years of diligent and faithful service in the Navy, the conspicuous courage and gallantry which he displayed in the capture and destruction of the pirate vessel and crew off the coast of Mexico, his judicious and vigorous conduct in the harbor of Rio de Janeiro, in resenting an insult offered the American flag—all this did not deter the President from reflecting on his good name. Conduct less meritorious and gallant than Admiral Brownson's has elicited for naval officers the thanks and commendations of Congress and has won for them the sword and medal—tokens of a nation's gratitude and appreciation. But for Admiral Brownson has been reserved, at the end of his active career, the badge of disloyalty, placed on his breast by the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. Shall we permit this condemnation and degradation, where honor and promotion should have been granted? Shall the charge of disloyalty to the interests of the Navy pass unnoticed and unchallenged by the representatives of the American people? Or are we restrained from the performance of our duty because, forsooth, there may be some who demand from us the recognition of some higher law than our Constitution and statutes, perhaps some unwritten law of lese majeste, a law which stamps opposition to the policies of the President as disloyalty to the country, a law which prescribes the dogma that the President, like the kings of old, can do no wrong? The doctrine of a higher law has been announced by the President, but it is a doctrine which the American people will never accept, nor will they recognize any law as higher or more sacred than our statutes, our Constitution, and the laws of God. [Applause.]

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILL. Certainly.

Mr GOULDEN. What was the rank of Doctor Stokes when he was appointed to command the Relief?

Mr. GILL. I do not know his actual rank, but he ranks in the Navy as a surgeon. He has the actual rank with line officers, but this provision of law prevented him from exercising command as a line officer, as he must necessarily do as commander of the hospital ship. I have not the time to go into this matter so thoroughly as I would like.

Mr. GOULDEN. When was the authority given to President McKinley to make new rules?

Mr. GILL. In March, 1901; it was appended to the naval appropriation act of that year.

With Admiral Brownson I challenge the right of the President and of the Secretary of the Navy to issue an order like that of December 30, 1907, appointing Doctor Stokes to command the naval hospital ship Relief. With Admiral Brownson I claim that the issuance of such an order is a direct violation of the statutes of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, the country has most generously established and maintained a naval academy, where young men seeking to enter the naval service as line officers are thoroughly grounded in the various branches of naval science, in navigation, in seamanship, in gunnery, and of late in engineering. It is absolutely essential that officers of the line should possess, and only officers of the line are required to possess, a thorough knowledge of these subjects. Therefore the exercise of any command in the Navy which demands a knowledge of navigation or seamanship or gunnery or engineering is a military command or a command in the line. The command of any of the vessels or ships of the Navy, including hospital ships, necessarily requires a knowledge either of all or some of these branches, which only line officers are required to be proficient in, and are naval military commands or commands in the line, as much so as a command of a fort or a company or a regiment in the Army is a military command and command in the line of the Army. This view has always been sanctioned by naval practice, by naval regulations, and by statute law, which have permitted the command of all naval vessels only to line officers and prohibited the exercise of military command to officers of the Staff Corps. Before staff officers were given relative and actual rank with line officers they were excluded from the command of vessels by the provisions of section 1529 of the Revised Statutes, which reads as follows:

> The vessels of the Navy of the United States shall be divided into four classes, and shall be commanded as nearly as may be as follows: First rates by commodores, second rates by captains, third rates by commanders, fourth rates by lieutenant-commanders.

But after staff officers were given relative and actual rank with line officers, the staff officers were prohibited from exercising any military command or command in the line or other staff corps by section 1488 of the Revised Statutes:

> The relative rank given by the provisions of this chapter to the officers of the Pay, Medical, and Engineer corps shall confer no authority to exercise military command.

And by the act of March 3, 1899, chapter 413, known as the "Personnel act," which provides:

> That all sections of the Revised Statutes which, in defining the rank of officers or positions in the Navy, contain the words "the relative rank of" are hereby amended so as to read "the rank of;" but officers whose rank is so defined shall not be entitled in virtue of their rank to command in the line or in other staff corps.

By the appropriation act of March 3, 1901, the President was authorized to establish and to modify a classification of the vessels of the Navy and to formulate appropriate rules governing the assignments to command vessels and squadrons. Under no circumstances can this act of March 3, 1901, be construed as withdrawing the right to command from the officers of the line, or as conferring upon the President authority to assign any but line officers to command vessels of the Navy. This act merely gives the President the right to change the classification of the vessels of the Navy and to formulate appropriate rules governing the assignment of line officers to the respective vessels of the Navy. Under the authority conferred upon him by this act President McKinley in 1901 reclassified the vessels of the Navy and designated hospital ships as third-raters, to be commanded, under section 36 of the Navy Regulations, by lieutenant-commanders, officers of the line. Up to the present time President Roosevelt has followed in the footsteps of President McKinley in this regard. He has himself approved these regulations which designated lieutenant-commanders to command third-raters, including hospital ships. Under sections 21 and 22 of these regulations, issued by Secretary of the Navy Morton on the 30th day of June, 1905, and approved by the President, we find the following:

> Art. 18, sec. 1. Officers of the line exercise military command.
> Art. 21, sec. 2. No officer shall by virtue of rank and precedence have additional right to quarters, nor shall they have authority to exercise command except in their own corps.

And further, under the title of "Law and decisions on command and rank," article 53, section C, we find that—

> The right of military command and to additional quarters is restricted by law.

It is quite clear, then, that under these statutes and regulations no staff officer may command a naval hospital ship. True, the President may change the rules for designating commands or assignments in the Navy, but such changes must be within the limitations established by the law as to military command. They must not conflict with the statutes prohibiting military command to officers of the staff. That the President can not issue any regulations on the subject which in any way conflict with the acts of Congress has been definitely established by the Symonds case (120 U. S., 146). Justice Harlan, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

> The authority of the Secretary of the Navy to issue orders, regulations, and instructions, with the approval of the President, in relation to matters connected with the naval establishment, is subject to the condition, necessarily implied, that they must be consistent with the statutes enacted by Congress in reference to the Navy. He may, with the approval of the President, establish regulations in execution of or supplementary to, but not in conflict with, the statutes defining his powers or conferring rights upon others.

At the international Hague conference of July 29, 1900, and at the Geneva conference of October 20, 1868, in both of which this country participated, two distinct kinds of hospital ships were recognized—military and nonmilitary hospital ships. Military hospital ships were at those conferences described as ships fitted out by a government solely and specially for the purpose of assisting the sick, wounded, and shipwrecked, and nonmilitary hospital ships as those fitted up by societies such as the Red Cross or by individuals, with the sanction of a government, for a similar purpose. The Relief, then, manifestly belongs to that class of vessels distinctly recognized in the treaties to which the United States is a party as military hospital ships. How, then, could the command of a naval military hospital ship be anything but a naval military command? Under these treaties a military hospital ship, when commanded by a surgeon, is not entitled to any greater immunities or exemptions than it is when commanded by a line officer. The Relief in time of war would not, under its present command, be entitled to any greater consideration than would be accorded it if it were commanded by an admiral.

Now, Mr. Chairman, having demonstrated that it is illegal for medical officers of the Navy to be assigned to command hospital ships, I do not propose in any way to discuss the policy, assuming it were legal, of enlarging the duties of the medical officers of the Navy so that they should embrace the command of hospital ships with civilian navigators. That is a matter which should be determined by the old sea dogs of our Navy, our admirals and our captains, not by landsmen like myself or the Secretary of the Navy or our late colonel of cavalry, Theodore Roosevelt. The illegality of the appointment of a surgeon to command a naval hospital ship was fairly put by Admiral Brownson both in his letter of resignation and in his memorandum of November 18, 1907. "It is directly contrary to law for a medical officer to exercise military command in any other than his own corps," said Admiral Brownson. To this warning President Roosevelt replies with an order appointing Doctor Stokes to command the Relief. No opinion on the subject seems to have been sought from the President's constitutional adviser, the Attorney-General—not even an opinion from the legal adviser of the Secretary of the Navy, the Judge-Advocate-General. But that is not all. Without the intervention of a court-martial, the President, by the publication of his extraordinary letter, in which he admits that there may be an honest difference of opinion on this subject, proceeds to punish and condemn one of the most faithful and respected officers of the United States Navy by lashing him with such terms as "unseemly," "improper," "childish," "reprehensible," "personal pique," "wounded vanity," "factional feeling," "ruffled temper," "disloyalty to the interests of the Navy, and therefore to the country as a whole"—classical terms and phrases, indicating the use not of the simple muck-rake of the "Pilgrim's Progress" days but of an up-to-date and modern muck rake whose operations are directed by a greatly heated and sensational mind.

"Disloyalty to the interests of the Navy, and therefore to the country as a whole," is the President's verdict concerning the conduct of this faithful veteran who has given forty years of his life to the service of his country! But fortunately it is left to the people of this country to judge whether this verdict is just; whether this charge, most damaging to the character and good name of Admiral Brownson, if true, should be permitted to stand unrefuted. Shakespeare says:

> Good name in man and woman, dear my lord,
> Is the immediate jewel of their souls:
> Who steals my purse, steals trash; 'tis something, nothing;
> 'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands;
> But he that filches from me my good name
> Robs me of that which not enriches him
> And makes me poor indeed.

The good name of a soldier or sailor grown gray in his country's service, who by the faithful performance of that service sacrifices every opportunity to acquire either legitimate or predatory wealth, is his chief and most precious possession. The filching of that good name leaves him more abject than the poorest serf.

It seems, Mr. Chairman, that one violation of the law leads to another. The Secretary of the Navy, in his eagerness to place a naval hospital ship under the command of a surgeon, has violated our coastwise commerce law, known as the act of March 1, 1817, confining the coastwise transportation of merchandise to the American merchant marine. I understand from a statement made on the floor of this House by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that the Secretary of the Navy, in order to put the Relief in commission, has seen fit to put two of the Government naval colliers out of commission. This left the Navy Department no alternative other than that of employing foreign vessels to carry coal for the fleet in place of those colliers put out of commission, as the Secretary of the Navy says that no American ship can be chartered at a reasonable price for this purpose. The employment of foreign vessels, as has been stated on this floor by the distinguished lawyer from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], is a violation of the law which I have just cited. It is the violation of one law for the purpose of facilitating the violation of another law. Moreover, the country is treated to the interesting spectacle in which the Secretary of the American Navy is helping to maintain the auxiliaries of foreign navies, which in time of war may be utilized in an attempt to exterminate the American Navy.

Another striking illustration of administrative disregard of the law is presented to us in the appointment of Mr. Rossiter to supersede the Public Printer, Mr. Stillings, who was recently suspended by the order of the President. On presenting his commission at the Treasury Department for the purpose of being bonded, Mr. Rossiter was informed by a judicious and courageous official that his appointment was not in conformity with the law and that therefore he would not bond him. How soon will the head of this law-respecting official follow that of Admiral Brownson into the Presidential decapitation basket?

These repeated violations of the law are not the kind of examples that can be fashioned into clubs with which to "whack" the heads of undesirable citizens to beat into them a wholesome respect for the law.

These violations of our statutes and the carelessness with which they are regarded are dangerous, not only as vicious examples, but as corrupting precedents which may sap the very foundations upon which our dual form of government rests. It is but one step from the violation of the provisions of the statute law to the violation of the most sacred provisions of our organic law. If we connive at the contemptuous spirit in which our laws are dealt with in high administrative circles, it will not be long before attempts will be made by the Federal Government to usurp the powers clearly reserved by the Constitution to the several States. If we recognize the wisdom which animated our patriotic forefathers when they erected the framework of our Government, if we appreciate the blessings of a Government founded upon law and order, if we are eager to conserve the security and well-being of the people of this great country, then we must boldly and unflinchingly demand of our high administrative officers the same respect and veneration for our laws as we expect from the humblest citizen in the land.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that though the President of the United States has twice asserted his determination not to be a candidate for a third term, it is currently reported throughout the country that his last message was a bid for renomination. Indeed, so strong is the impression among the masses that President Roosevelt is seeking a third term that it has become the source of topical songs in our music halls, the refrain of one of them being—

> It's Taft or I,
> And that's the cry
> In Washington.

By many it is claimed that the President is the only man who can harmonize the clashing interests and tendencies of the reactionary and the progressive camps into which the Republican party is split. On one occasion, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Gladstone was asked to explain the difference between the words "misfortune" and "calamity." He replied with this illustration:

Suppose that Disraeli fell into the river Thames—that would be a misfortune; but suppose that somebody dragged him out—that would be a calamity.

If the Republican party should nominate President Roosevelt for a third term that would be a misfortune to the Republican party. If, however, President Roosevelt should be reelected for a third term it would be a calamity for the country. [Applause.]

I append the following letters of Admiral Brownson to the Secretary of the Navy:

INCLOSURE A.

DECEMBER, 24, 1907.

SIR: In April last I was detached by your order from the command of the United States Asiatic fleet and ordered to Washington and appointed Chief of the most important Bureau in the Navy Department, the Bureau which under the Secretary is charged with matters relating to the personnel, the discipline, and the efficiency of the fleet.

This transfer from a command which ranks second in importance afloat, to one which is second to none on shore, coming on the eve of my retirement from active service while not to my personal liking was deeply gratifying to me as it appeared to be an evidence of your confidence in my professional ability.

In order, however, that any efforts of mine to maintain a high standard of efficiency and discipline in the service be attended with success, it is absolutely essential that I should have the confidence of the service at large as well as that of higher authority. The efficiency of the fleet can only be maintained when the officers and men feel that the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation has the confidence of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and when a strong military spirit exists in the service. Anything that shows a lack of confidence or that tends to break down this military spirit, which has been the safeguard and principal asset of the Navy since its beginning, can but impair such efficiency.

The recent order placing a medical officer in command of a hospital ship is, in my opinion, and as I have endeavored on several occasions to point out to you, clearly opposed to the intent of the law; is a radical departure from established naval usage and is fraught with danger to the efficiency of the fleet, will tend I believe to break down the military spirit of the service and shows a want of your confidence in my advice regarding a matter so vital to the best interests of the service.

I am left, therefore, with no alternative but to tender my resignation as Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, much as I regret to sever my active connection with the service to which I have been devoted and to which I have given my best efforts for over forty-six years.

Very respectfully,

W. H. BROWNSON,
Chief of Bureau.

INCLOSURE 7.

NOVEMBER 18, 1907.

COMMISSIONING OF THE "RELIEF" FOR DUTY AS A HOSPITAL SHIP.

Respectfully forwarded to the Department.

The Bureau appreciates the fact that at the present time the necessary accommodations for the sick on the Pacific coast are inadequate, and, as stated in a recent indorsement by this Bureau on a communication from the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, the Bureau intends to recommend the commissioning of the Relief as a hospital ship in order that the vessel may be available when the battle ships arrive at Magdalena Bay.

The Bureau earnestly requests that the question of providing the officers and crew for the Relief, particularly as regards the command of the vessel, be reconsidered by the Department, and begs to submit the reasons which, in the opinion of this Bureau, should influence the Department in reversing its previous decision.

An examination of the accompanying papers shows that the decision of the Department dated December 12, 1906, which states, among other things, that a hospital ship when placed in commission shall be under the command of a medical officer, appears to be the outcome of the recommendation of a joint board of medical officers of the Army and Navy, convened by order of the Secretary of War. This board was appointed to "consider improvement in the first-aid dressings and uniformity of equipment in the medical departments of the two services."

While the Bureau freely admits that the question of the medical equipment of a hospital ship is one on which the medical officers of the Army and Navy are eminently qualified to express an opinion, the Bureau begs to submit that the question of manning a seagoing vessel is one which sea line officers of the Navy are best qualified to decide.

While a hospital ship is a vessel of peculiar international status and can only be employed in time of war for a specific purpose, the fact still remains that, whether it is a hospital ship or not, it is a seagoing vessel, and in order to accompany the fleet to fulfill the purposes for which it is designed, it must be navigated and handled in the same seamanlike manner which is required of all vessels to insure safety on the high seas.

The Bureau begs to submit that, however qualified medical officers may be in their profession, there is, on the other hand, nothing in the training of a medical officer which fits him to command a seagoing vessel.

The contention of the Surgeon-General that a medical officer should command a hospital ship appears to be based entirely upon the assumption that such a ship is a floating hospital, as he states: "It must be borne in mind that a hospital ship is a floating hospital and that the most finished professional training in navigation, ordnance, and seamanship does not render line officers well fitted to command hospitals."

The Bureau is well aware that it does not require professional training in navigation, ordnance, and seamanship to command a hospital, provided such hospital is located on shore, or even if such a hospital were a hulk securely and safely moored and not required to move; but the fact must not be lost sight of that the use to which a vessel is put has no effect whatever in lessening the dangers which will be encountered in navigating such a ship in all kinds of weather and under various circumstances.

It requires just as skillful a navigator to pilot a hospital ship as it does to pilot a man-of-war, a mail steamer, or a yacht. The difficulties of pilotage, navigation, and handling a vessel are wholly independent of its internal arrangements or the uses to which the vessel may be put.

The statement of the Surgeon-General that a hospital ship "is not a man-of-war, but a hospital," does not give a complete statement of the case. Without doubt a hospital ship is not a man-of-war, but has a peculiar status which is clearly defined by the Geneva convention. On the other hand, to call it a hospital does not fully describe the ship. It would be more nearly correct and descriptive of its true character to state that a hospital ship is a seagoing vessel having a large hospital on board, and it is for the general administration, navigation, and handling of the seagoing vessel that a sea line officer should be ordered to command. As to the control and administration of the medical department of such a vessel, existing regulations give medical officers all necessary authority to control and care for their department on board ship.

The Surgeon-General again states that "the command of the medical officer should be absolute" and that the captain should not be a naval officer, but should belong to the merchant marine and should have entire control of the navigation of the ship and of the civilian crew and regulate discipline and matters pertaining to them. It would seem from this statement that in the opinion of the Surgeon-General the navigation, safe conduct, and general administration of a seagoing vessel are secondary as regards the responsibilities of command.

Telegraph operators or cable engineers are not put in command of cable ships nor are postmasters put in command of mail steamers. A battle ship can with propriety be called a floating fort, but artillery officers are not fitted for the command of them. It must not be forgotten that a ship is an inanimate object and requires at all times a competent officer in command to insure the safety of the vessel at sea.

Long experience with merchant crews and officers on board naval colliers, tank ships, transports, supply vessels, etc., shows that officers of the merchant marine do not perform this duty as efficiently as naval officers.

Some years ago on the Asiatic Station the auxiliaries were manned in three different ways: First, a number with full naval crews; second, others with merchant crews, and third, several with a merchant crew and officers and one line officer of the Navy in command. In addition to the line officer there was a paymaster.

As the result of experience with the various systems all in force at the same time and under similar conditions officers who have had experience with naval auxiliaries agree that the most efficient organization is obtained when these vessels are manned with a full naval crew, and it is only the fact that at present there is such a shortage of officers and men that naval auxiliaries are not so manned.

Of the three systems above noted that which caused the greatest number of complications and was the least efficient was the third, i. e., a naval officer in command with a full merchant crew and officers. On board such vessels the crew and officers are amenable only to the navigation laws of the United States. They are shipped and discharged in the presence of a United States naval officer or the shipping commissioner, or in a foreign port in the presence of a United States counsul or United States naval officer. Neither the United States Navy Regulations nor the navigation laws of the United States contemplate any such division of authority as exists on board a vessel so manned. The following is an extract from a letter addressed by the commander in chief of the United States Asiatic Fleet to the naval officers in command of the colliers Iris and Nanshan, defining the status of the officer in command and the master:

"The naval officer in command will be held responsible for the navigation, safety, movement, preservation, and cleanliness of the vessel to which he is attached, and he shall relieve the master of such responsibilities whenever he finds it necessary to assume direct control himself.

"There are peculiar conditions existing on the Government vessels carrying merchant officers, with naval officers on board who have been placed there in the interest of the Government. By merchant laws all punishments, shippings, and discharges of crew must be made by the master under existing laws. In addition to these, there are many functions on board these vessels that may not be exercised by the naval officer in command. But the naval officer in command is to be obeyed in all orders that he sees fit to give, and he will be held responsible for any orders promulgated by him that are incompatible with the merchant laws of the United States, except as set forth in paragraph 1 of this letter, which are essential for the best interests of the Government.

"The foregoing instructions being absolute, the naval officer in command will endeavor to arrange matters, through the master, so that everything may work harmoniously, and that the master may not seem to lose any of the privileges or authority due him by the merchant shipping laws of the United States.

"A copy of this letter shall be furnished the master of the vessel you command. He must agree to the conditions herein set forth, or be discharged from his position if he is not satisfied with these decisions."

The following letter was also addressed by the commander in chief to the masters of these vessels:

"A commissioned line officer of the United States Navy having been ordered to command the vessel of which you are master, you are hereby informed that all functions, duties, and responsibilities regularly belonging to you as a duly installed master, under the laws governing the merchant marine of the United States, are retained by you.

"The naval officer in command is, however, a higher authority, and you will obey him, as the representative of the commander in chief, in the same manner that you would obey a private owner of the vessel. All orders, however, from outside authority regarding the vessel will be given to the commanding officer; and you will also make reports and communications concerning her to him."

Notwithstanding the fact that these instructions appear to be explicit, complications constantly arose, not only as regarding the navigation of the vessels but also in respect to the administration of affairs including relations with the crew.

As regards the navigation of the vessel, the case of the Iris running ashore on Sikijor Island may be cited and the case of a disturbance created by the second officer of the Nanshan in the harbor of Hongkong may also be mentioned as regards the relations of the naval officer with the crew.

A brief description of both these instances may be of interest. The U. S. S. Iris was, in 1901, making a passage from Cebu to Tacloban, in the Philippine Islands, and ran ashore on Sikijor Island. A board appointed to investigate the grounding found it due to the ship's overrunning the patent log, westerly current and leeway, thick weather, and poor judgment in setting the course. The board also found that the naval officer in command "did not take all precautions to assure himself of the proper navigation of the ship, but owing to the anomalous position of a naval officer on board the Iris with a merchant crew and officers, subject to the orders of the master, and owing to the duties and responsibilities and authority given the master by the United States laws for the merchant service, the board is of the opinion that no further action should be taken in the case of * * * , but that master * * * should be discharged."

Owing to the fact that there was divided authority on board the Iris, the commander in chief and the Department approved the finding of the board. In this connection it may be stated that the naval officer was an officer of experience and unquestioned professional ability.

The case of the Nanshan was as follows: The Nanshan was at anchor in the harbor of Hongkong. The second officer during the evening became intoxicated and noisy. The naval officer in command sent word to the master for him to pipe down. This the second officer not only declined, but failed to do. After several warnings, the naval officer directed the master to put the second officer in irons. This the master declined to do, stating that his crew and officers were shipped under the navigation laws, which prohibited such action on his part while the vessel was in port. The naval officer then asked the master what he would do were he in actual command of the vessel without a naval officer on board. The master replied that he would send for the harbor police. The naval officer then directed him to request the harbor police to take charge of the second officer. The harbor police declined to interfere, as the Nanshan was a Government vessel under the command of the naval officer. At this juncture the second officer retired to his room, locked the door, and threatened to shoot anybody who tried to force an entrance. After firing four shots through the door the naval officer took the law into his own hands, broke down the door, and disarmed the second officer.

It will be noted from the foregoing that a situation existed on board the Nanshan which no one was legally competent to cope with.

Owing to the legal complications involved, the only action taken was to discharge the second officer the following day in the harbor of Hongkong.

If a hospital ship were merely a floating hospital, as the Surgeon-General states in his indorsement, and the ship were securely moored and not called upon to move from point to point, it would perhaps be well not to have any sea line officers on board. It would appear, however, that in addition to the navigation of the vessel and ship administration connected therewith the discipline of the crew has been entirely lost sight of. Both the law and the Navy Regulations state that officers of the line exercise military command. On board a hospital ship when in commission for sea service and cruising in company with a fleet, there will always be a certain number of enlisted men of the Navy, Marine Corps, and, perhaps, of the Army, who are convalescent, many of them practically well and nearly ready for duty. The temptation for these men to commit infractions of discipline will be various on board a hospital ship, and in addition to ordinary infractions they will be liable to get into difficulties with the merchant crew of the vessel; the latter

(if the vessel is manned in accordance with the recommendation of the Surgeon-General) are amenable only to the navigation laws of the United States. The Bureau fails to see how there can be any complete control over the discipline of the personnel on board a hospital ship when part of such personnel is amenable only to one set of laws, the other to the Navy Regulations; the officer in command being an officer who by law is forbidden the right of exercising military command except in his own corps, the master of the ship being a civilian with no legal right to control men in the Navy.

Officers intrusted with the command of United States vessels, whatever their rank, must, while properly in such command, have full command, authority, and precedence over all officers and persons of whatever rank serving in such vessels. The efficiency of every military organization requires of the commanding authority, besides the general duties of command and direction, the additional duties of organization, police, and inspection; all these appertain to and go with the command. The officer in command of a vessel is not authorized to delegate his power, except for the carrying out of the details of the general duties to be performed by his authority. The command is his, and he can neither delegate the duties of it to another nor avoid its burdens, nor escape its official responsibilities, which can not be assumed by or fall upon any other person.

By the force of naval law, and regulations made in conformity therewith, the above principles are established and exist as essentials of all naval military service, without which there can be neither command, discipline, nor responsibility.

The following extracts from the statute law of the United States have a direct bearing on the exercise of military command by medical officers:

The act of Congress approved March 3, 1871 (Stat. L., vol. 16, p. 537), states:

"Commanding officers of vessels of war and of naval stations shall take precedence over all officers placed under their command * * *."

Section 4 of the act of Congress approved August 5, 1854, fixing the rank of medical officers of the Navy, states:

"This order confers no authority to exercise military command and no additional right to quarters."

Section 7 of the "personnel act" (which became a law March 3, 1899), in amending the Revised Statutes so as to confer upon staff officers positive rank with the line, contains the limiting clause:

"But officers whose rank is so defined shall not be entitled in virtue of their rank to command in the line or in other staff corps."

These laws are prohibitive of the full exericse of command by a medical officer, and he could not, therefore, legally command the paymaster, the crew, the commissary force, etc., which the vessel, as an adjunct to the fleet or acting singly, must necessarily have.

A comparison of the system advocated by the Surgeon-General and that recommended by this Bureau as regards discipline speaks for itself. Assume that a hospital ship (manned as reccmmended by the Surgeon-General) has on board: (a) Merchant crew and officers; (b) Hospital Corps of the Navy; (c) enlisted men of the Navy (patients); (d) enlisted men of the Marine Corps (patients); (e) enlisted men of the Army (patients); (f) enlisted men of the Navy (commissary branch); (g) officers of the Navy (patients); (h) a pay officer.

The merchant crew and officers are amenable only to the navigation laws of the United States and subject only to the orders of the master.

The Hospital Corps men are amenable to Navy Regulations and subject to orders from the medical officers, but in case of a disturbance they would be subject to the orders of the senior line officer present (should there be one embarked as a patient).

The enlisted men of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Army are all amenable to the Navy Regulations while embarked, but the law and regulations do not permit a medical officer to exercise military command, nor do they permit the civilian master to enforce Navy Regulations.

With a line officer of the Navy in command (with a full Navy crew and officers), any situation that might arise is not only fully covered by the Navy Regulations and the officer in command is one who by his training is fully competent to handle the situation.

The Surgeon-General states that "with a medical officer in command occasions for conflicts and differences of opinion on questions of expediency and methods of procedure affecting the ship as a hospital would be removed."

The Navy Regulations clearly define the exact status of medical officers on board ship as regards their duties, prerogatives, and responsibilities. With a line officer in command no situation can arise which is not fully covered by the Regulations, but with a medical officer in command a situation is at once created which is not only contrary to existing law, but which has no precedent in our service.

It appears clear to the Bureau that by removing the line officers the "occasions for conflicts of authority" will be multiplied instead of diminished.

Revised Statutes of the United States define the master of a vessel as follows:

"In the construction of this title (Rev. Stat., 4501–4613), every person having the command of any vessel belonging to any citizen of the United States shall be deemed to be the 'master' thereof * * *;" and also:

"The word 'master,' as used in this title (Rev. Stat., 2517–3129), may include any person having the chief charge or command of the employment and navigation of a vessel."

From the foregoing it will be seen that the Revised Statutes regard the master as intrusted with the chief charge or command of a vessel, and the law holds him responsible for the enforcement of certain rules and regulations, not only in relation to the navigation of the vessel, but in enforcing discipline. The law, however, only contemplates that he will be required to enforce discipline as regards civilians.

The Surgeon-General again states "the discipline of the medical branch should be in the hands of the medical officer in command."

The Surgeon-General seems to have overlooked or disregarded the question of the control of the paymaster, the disciplining of the enlisted men embarked in the hospital ship as patients and the members of the crew of the vessel.

The Bureau takes strong exception to the following statement of the Surgeon-General:

"The command is eminently a noncombatant one, is consequently not desired by officers of the line, and falls naturally to a medical officer whose knowledge and experience in all matters relating to the administration of quarters for the sick and the treatment and handling of patients fit him for the command of a ship which is not a man-of-war, but a floating hospital."

The Bureau is of the opinion that the above is not a logical deduction, for were it so that "knowledge and experience in all matters relating to the administration of quarters for the sick and the treatment and handling of patients" fit a man for the command of a seagoing vessel (employed as a hospital ship) it would also follow that the manager of a large, well-run hotel would be competent to command a large trans-Atlantic liner engaged in the passenger trade, which is also not a man-of-war but a floating hotel.

The Bureau concurs with the Surgeon-General in the opinion that "experience in such matters is a better guide than theory," and begs to quote from the annual report of the present Surgeon-General for the year 1898:

"The Solace is fitted out under the requirements of the Geneva convention and flies the Geneva cross flag. She is the pioneer in her work, and indicates a step in advance that it well became the United States to take. * * * The vessel has been fortunate in her personnel. Commander Dunlap is an ideal commander, and the medical officers of the vessel, Surgeon Streets and Passed Assistant Surgeons Stokes, Smith, and Bogert, have shown themselves thoroughly competent and efficient in caring for the many sick and wounded who have been under their charge. Three hospital stewards, one of whom was a skilled embalmer, 8 trained nurses, a cook, 4 messmen, and 2 laundrymen were especially designated in the medical department."

Extract from the report of Surgeon Streets, the senior surgeon on board the Solace, 1898:

"I can not give too much credit for the good results obtained to my able assistants, Passed Assistant Surgeons Charles F. Stokes, G. Tucker Smith, and Edward S. Bogert. Every member of the Hospital Corps has performed his duties in the most efficient manner. Every effort of mine has been cordially seconded by Commander A. Dunlap, United States Navy, the commanding officer of the Solace."

The experience gained with naval auxiliaries on board of which divided authority existed is fully set forth in the inclosed report from the senior squadron commander of the Asiatic fleet and has a direct bearing on the present point at issue. It would appear, therefore, that if, as stated by the Surgeon-General, "experience in such matters is a better guide than theory," the result of experience in our Navy shows beyond a shadow of a doubt that naval auxiliaries (of which hospital ships are not the least important) are least efficient when manned as recommended by the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery.

From the foregoing it will be apparent that the commissioning of a hospital ship for sea service as recommended by the Surgeon-General will be fraught with endless complications, the chief of which are as follows:

1. It is directly contrary to the law for a medical officer to exercise military command in any other than his own corps.
2. Divided responsibility leads to confusion and poor administration.
3. Experience both with the Solace in the Spanish-American war and with auxiliaries on the Asiatic Station shows conclusively that the only organization for the fleet auxiliary is to have a full naval crew and officers.
4. A seagoing ship to be efficient must of necessity be commanded by a seagoing officer.

In conclusion, the Bureau has to state that this is a matter of vital importance to the naval service, and it is requested that the Department's former decision be revoked and that instructions be issued for the commissioning of the Relief with a full Navy crew and officers.

Very respectfully,

W. H. BROWNSON,
Chief of Bureau.

The SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, we have heard the naval subject discussed here this afternoon from a scientific standpoint, a sentimental standpoint, and, I am almost tempted to add, from a hysterical standpoint. I would like to ask the committee at this hour to consider it from the business standpoint, and to direct attention to one of the most important questions in the whole naval service—the question of naval administration.

Mr. Chairman, this is not a sentimental proposition; this is a great business proposition, involving as it does the expenditure of the $100,000,000 which we appropriate annually for this great arm of the national defense. Upon this problem of administration rests the question of whether these millions are expended economically and wisely or whether they shall be expended wastefully and extravagantly. But this question of naval administration, Mr. Chairman, is even more than a business proposition. It is a question which goes to the very root of the efficiency of the naval service itself; it has a most important bearing upon the efficiency of the material of the Navy; it is vital to whether or not we will have good guns, good ammunition and good ships; it is vital likewise to the personnel of the Navy, because on the question of administration depends the esprit de corps of the officers and men of the entire Navy.

It may be a matter of surprise to some Members of the House to know that the present administrative organization of the Navy Department is almost seventy years old. Is it any wonder, Mr. Chairman, with the tremendous advances that have been made, both in naval and in commercial matters, during these seventy years that the present administrative system in the Navy Department does not measure up to present-day business standards? I say, is it any wonder that this system of administration is outworn, out of date, and obsolete?

The present plan of administration in the Navy Department was adopted in 1842, and the law has been only slightly amended since. At that time, upon the recommendation of Secretary Upshur, Congress passed a law creating five bureaus in the Navy Department. Since that time three other bureaus have been added, with some rearrangement and readjustment of duties, and now we have in the Navy Department eight separate bureaus, as follows:

Navigation, having charge of the personnel and the movements of the fleet, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy.

Yards and Docks: The construction and maintenance of public works in navy-yards and at naval stations.
Supplies and Accounts: Provisions, clothing, small stores, accounts, and pay of the Navy.
Medicine and Surgery: Its name explains its duties.
Construction and Repair: The ships' hulls, turrets, ammunition hoists, etc.
Steam Engineering: Steam-propelling machinery of the ships.
Ordnance: Guns, ammunition, and parts of the electrical machinery on the ships.
Equipment: Equipment of ships, and supplying most of their electrical apparatus.

It should be remembered, Mr. Chairman, as we go along, that the Bureau of Construction and Repair, the Bureau of Steam Engineering, the Bureau of Ordnance, and the Bureau of Equipment are the ones principally concerned in the construction and the repair of ships.

Under the law as it stands now it is provided that the orders of these chiefs of bureaus, pertaining to their respective duties, shall be considered as emanating from the Secretary of the Navy, and "shall have full force and effect as such." Mark that. The orders of each chief of bureau shall have the full force and effect as though the orders had been issued by the Secretary of the Navy himself. In other words, instead of one head of Department we have under this old organization nine heads operating within one Department.

There is nothing in existing law which provides for any co-operation or any coordination among those several bureaus. Each is entirely independent, subject only to the Secretary himself. They all stand on an equal footing. Under the law each bureau may proceed in its own way according to the chief's idea of what is for the best interest of that bureau. The system is lacking in that one feature that is most essential for good administration and best results—there is no single controlling influence below the Secretary to corelate the work of the different bureaus. Thus responsibility is divided among eight different heads, which has the effect of there being practically no responsibility at all for the work as a whole. Secretary Moody, when he was at the head of that great Department, recognized and set forth in his annual report some of the defects of the system as he found them. What did he say?

The distribution of business among bureaus independent of and correlated to each other (except through the action of the Secretary) unquestionably creates the condition out of which grow conflicts of jurisdiction between the bureaus, sometimes injurious, and a tendency to consider the interests of the bureaus rather than the interests of the Navy. The division of business in the bureaus extends to the navy-yards and even to some extent to ships in commission. This leads sometimes to excessive and cumbersome organization, and lack of harmony of effort resulting from the fact that there is no co-ordination except by the voluntary action of the bureau chiefs.

That is testimony of one who was in the Department long enough to familiarize himself with conditions there. But, Mr. Chairman, how does this system operate, both in the Department and in the navy-yards throughout the country? Perhaps we can best determine the character of its operation by examining its work in the repair of ships, which is conducted at these navy-yards. Last summer the Committee on Naval Affairs made a tour of inspection of all the navy-yards on the Atlantic coast from Norfolk north to Portsmouth, and we went in and examined carefully the condition at each of these yards. This examination disclosed a wasteful duplication and multiplication of plants, buildings, and equipment which can not be otherwise than extravagant in the expenditure of the public money, and it emphasized the necessity for some consolidation of bureaus. Each of the four bureaus which have to do with the repair or the construction of ships had at the different navy-yards a separate and independent plant. Each had sought to build up its own bureau there, that it might be entirely independent of all the others. Thus, at every one of these navy-yards, instead of finding one complete, fully organized, well-trained enterprise, we found what was virtually four separate plants at each yard.

Each of the bureaus has its own force of workmen, each has its own machinery, its own buildings, and its own peculiar method of doing business. For instance, at the navy-yard at New York we found that the Bureau of Construction and Repair had a paint shop, and so did the Bureau of Yards and Docks, the Bureau of Equipment, and the Bureau of Steam Engineering—Equipment maintaining a shop with three painters, while the Steam Engineering had another shop in which was employed one lone painter. The same was true of the carpenter shops, except the Ordnance Bureau had one in addition to these other four, making five carpenter shops in a single yard. Of those five shops, three were employing less than ten men each. And so it went. What was true of paint shops and carpenter shops was equally true of pattern shops, blacksmith shops, coppersmith shops, and foundries.

Will anyone contend that this is anything except a most wasteful and extravagant method of carrying on a purely industrial business, because the repair of ships is not military in its character, it is purely the industrial side of the Navy? Such a plan of course requires a useless duplication of machinery, of buildings, and of supervising force. But this condition is only the natural result of a system which makes each bureau independent of the other, and where at every navy-yard each bureau is watching every other bureau with jealous eye. With Congress making separate appropriations for each of these bureaus, it becomes, as one naval officer tersely stated it, simply a game of "grab." If a given bureau has secured an appropriation for a new building at a certain yard, the following year each of the other bureaus are supplicating Congress to treat it with like liberality.

This whole bureau system, as exemplified at the navy-yards, is unbusinesslike; it is cumbersome and extravagant and, as Secretary Long so well said in one of his official reports while he was Secretary of the Navy, "No private business in the world would be run on such a wasteful and inharmonious plan."

But how does the present bureau system operate in the Navy Department itself? The public has had many striking instances within the last year of the friction and contentions that arise in that Department by reason of the fact that there are eight separate and independent bureaus, each practically supreme in the duties which are assigned to it by the Secretary of the Navy. The heads of these bureaus are but human, and it is too much to expect that they will not take advantage of every opportunity which occurs that will increase the magnitude or the importance of their respective duties. As Secretary Moody says, the operation of the system has a tendency to cause the bureau chiefs to consider "the interests of the bureaus rather than the interests of the Navy."

I hope gentlemen will understand that I am not criticising individuals. I am simply offering these suggestions regarding a system which prevails, in the hope that we can accord to the Navy Department in due course better and more modern machinery with which to conduct the work of that great Department.

I need not relate in detail the incidents which have arisen from time to time, and some of which have been alluded to in this debate, showing the clashing of interests and authority under this system of independent bureaus, each, mind you, with the power to issue independent orders of the same authority as those issued by the Secretary of the Navy himself.

If we are in any doubt as to the workings of this system in the Department, let us summon a witness here who is eminently qualified to speak with authority, one who by experience, by knowledge, and by courage is entitled to the consideration of this House. I allude to the Hon. John D. Long, who for five years was Secretary of that great Department, and it might be added parenthetically, that he was in charge of that Department for a longer period than any other man who has held that portfolio in the last decade. He was there long enough to understand the workings of that Department and to master its defects. He recognized the faults of the existing bureau system, and in his annual report for 1899 he recommended that three of these bureaus, these three bureaus that have to deal with the construction and fitting out of vessels, should be merged into a single bureau. That recommendation was as follows:

CONSOLIDATION OF BUREAUS.

In the opinion of the Department it would be in the interest of good business organization and economy to consolidate the three Bureaus of Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, and Equipment under one head—the Bureau of Ships. These Bureaus have to do with the construction and fitting out of vessels; in one word, the material of the ship. It is an integral work. When a contract is made for the construction of a ship, it is made with one builder. It is not given part to a constructor of hulls, part to a steam-engine manufacturer, and part to an outfitting firm. Whatever various trades enter into the work are all under one head. This is the method of private shipyards which build the largest ships and which are not left to the administration of three heads between whom delicate questions of respective authority and responsibility are liable to arise, resulting in delays and too often in friction and lack of harmony of cooperation.

Each of the above Bureaus has now, during the construction of naval vessels, its separate inspectors at each yard. A consolidated bureau could, of course, be run much cheaper than three bureaus, and a great saving made by a reduction of the now three separate working forces, both clerical and mechanical, especially in our navy-yards. Fewer naval officers would be needed, as there would be but one staff instead of three, so that more officers would be available for other duty. Under the present system one Bureau brings its work to the point of readiness for the work of another, which is not always ready for it. There is necessarily a lack of that adaptation and harmony of movement which one head would secure.

If this consolidation were effected, the matter of furnishing coal and other current supplies, which is now under the direction of the Bureau of Equipment, could be easily transferred to the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, and such other incidental changes made as became necessary.

The foregoing suggestion is made solely with a view to an improvement in departmental organization, and with the highest appreciation of the ability and dutifulness with which these Bureaus have been administered under their present heads. Efficient as they have been, however, their consolidation is recommended, because it is believed that if consolidated under the direction of any one of their present heads, or of any competent officer, that efficiency would be still greater, less expense incurred, and a better business organization would succeed.

The terms of office of the chiefs of the three Bureaus will all expire in a little more than a year, one of those officers then going upon the retired list, and it is due to them all, as an assurance that the change is recommended on systematic and not personal grounds, to suggest that if made, it shall not go into effect until the beginning of the fiscal year after the expiration of their said terms.

It is most interesting, in the consideration of the workings of the present system, to note what he has to say in his annual report for the year 1900 when he renewed that recommendation. Here is what he said:

CONSOLIDATION OF BUREAUS.

The recommendation heretofore made that the organization of the Navy Department be simplified by the consolidation of the three Bureaus of Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, and Equipment is renewed. Under the present system, from the inception of its design until completed and placed in commission, the plans and specifications of a naval vessel are in the hands of three bureaus, each with a distinct organization, each having exclusive jurisdiction within certain lines, and all charged with the duty of carrying on work within, but not beyond, their respective provinces, as nearly as may be at the same time.

Such a system is, in practical administration, cumbrous and expensive, and from its very nature tends to develop controversies respecting the scope of each bureau's duties and to occasion friction, delay, and want of harmony in doing whatever approaches border lines of jurisdiction. It is to the credit of the officers in charge of the bureaus concerned that work upon ships now under construction has been carried on without more friction; but the system itself is none the less objectionable, and is a source of inconvenience, delay, largely increased cost, and occasional confusion.

The present divided organization is the outgrowth of conditions which no longer exist. The hull, the propelling machinery, and the articles of equipment of a modern steamship no longer constitute simple, distinct, and separable elements in construction, but, on the contrary, in their multiplicity of details are so interwoven as to render embarrassing their supervision by three sets of independent administrative officials.

The union of these three bureaus, the chief function of which is to deal with the material of the ship, into one bureau, which might appropriately be called the "Bureau of Ships;" the consolidation of their several corps of assistants and inspectors, and the conduct of the really integral work of building and equipping vessels, under the management of one responsible chief instead of three chiefs, would promote the efficient and economical administration of this important part of the business of the Navy Department.

A chief of bureau is practically an assistant secretary. The proposed consolidation would not only reduce three of these assistants to one, but in like manner reduce the supervising, mechanical, and clerical forces in every navy-yard, and thus save great and unnecessary expense. At present each of these bureaus in question has at each yard its separate shops, inspectors, foremen, and workmen, all often doing the same kind of work. No private business is run on such a wasteful and inharmonious plan. I renew the recommendation in this respect of my last annual report.

Let me cite to the House one or two instances to show the complications arising out of the present divided organization in the Navy Department to which Secretary Long alluded. In the installation of the fire-control apparatus on a battle ship—and you all understand what the fire-control apparatus is; it is, in comparison with the other elements of the ship, a very simple matter—it would naturally be supposed that one bureau would be sufficient to install the fire-control apparatus, and yet under the existing system three separate and distinct bureaus have cognizance of the installation of this apparatus on a battle ship. Again, we find that the Bureau of Steam Engineering owns the steam pipes on the pumps and the engines which are under the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Construction and Repair. The Bureau of Steam Engineering likewise controls the deck hatches and gratings leading to the boiler and engine rooms, and also that part of the hull-drainage pipes that drain these compartments. Countless other instances might be cited to show that the lines of authority between the different bureaus within a single battle ship are mixed in bewildering confusion. These are not faults of the bureau method, but they are faults of the bureau system which, in its present form, can not be adjusted to suit the natural divisions in shipbuilding which have come about by reason of the change from wooden sailing vessels to steel steamships.

I am not one of those Members of this House who believe that he has done his duty in any matter when he has pointed out the defects. It is easy enough to criticise; anybody can find fault. I believe it is equally a part of his duty to come forward with some remedy to correct existing defects as he may find them. In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, the remedy for the present situation which exists in the administration of the Navy Department rests in reorganization and in the consolidation of certain bureaus in that Department. [Applause.] And after a careful examination of the whole subject I prepared and introduced on January 7 last a bill seeking to put the Navy of the United States upon a business basis, both as a weapon of war and as an industry. The bill to which I refer is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12425) to reorganize the Navy Department of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc.*, That the business of the Department of the Navy shall be distributed by the Secretary of the Navy between a Division of Personnel and a Division of Material.

SEC. 2. That the Division of Personnel shall comprise all that relates to the Navy personnel, its training, discipline, and detail; all of the officers, enlisted men, and cadets, ashore or afloat, and such civilian clerks as may be provided by law for departmental work in said division, and of material of every kind and description that is transferred to the Division of Personnel for use in the service until it is by said division returned to the Division of Material, to be put out of commission or for repairs or for sale by condemnation proceedings.

SEC. 3. That the Division of Material shall comprise all that relates to the design, construction, equipment, and maintenance of ships, ordnance, machinery, yards and docks, and all material of every kind and description, or the purchase and manufacture of the same and the control of the same until it is transferred to the Division of Personnel for use.

SEC. 4. That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint two Assistant Secretaries of the Navy. The First Assistant Secretary of the Navy shall be a naval officer not below the grade of captain, who shall have charge of the Division of Personnel.

That there shall be created in said Division of Personnel three bureaus, as follows: The Bureau of Navigation, the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, and the Office of Judge-Advocate-General of the Navy. The Bureau of Navigation shall perform the duties and business of the present Bureau of Navigation, and in addition thereto shall have charge of the Naval Observatory, the Nautical Almanac, and the Hydrographic Office; and the Chief of the Hydrographic Office shall hereafter be called the Hydrographer of the Navy.

That the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation shall be appointed from the lists of line officers not below the rank of captain and junior in grade of the Assistant Secretary.

There shall be at such navy-yards and naval stations as the Secretary of the Navy may designate, a naval officer who shall be known as the Commandant of Personnel, who shall have charge of the personnel that may be ashore, under such regulations as to the use of any portions of said navy-yards or naval stations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, not in conflict with any portion of this act.

That the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery shall perform the same duties as the present Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, and the Office of Judge-Advocate-General of the Navy shall perform the same duties as the present Office of the Judge-Advocate-General.

SEC. 5. That the Second Assistant Secretary of the Navy shall be a civilian, and he shall have charge of the Division of Material. In the Division of Material there shall be three bureaus, as follows: The Bureau of Ship Construction, the Bureau of Ordnance, and the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts.

That the duties and business heretofore performed and transacted by the Bureaus of Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, Equipment, and Yards and Docks shall be performed and transacted by the Bureau of Ship Construction.

That in the Bureau of Ship Construction there shall be three divisions, to be called, respectively, the division of construction, the division of machinery, and the division of yards and docks.

That the duties and business of the Bureau of Ship Construction shall be distributed among the three divisions as the Chief of the Bureau, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Navy, may direct.

That the Chief of the Bureau of Ship Construction shall be appointed from the lists of line offices or naval constructors not below the grade of commander, and if below the grade of rear-admiral shall, while holding said office, have the rank of real-admiral. The chief of the division of construction shall be appointed from the list of naval constructors, the chief of the division of machinery from the list of line officers having skill as engineers, and the chief of the division of yards and docks from the list of line officers, in each case not below the grade of commander, and shall, while holding said office, receive the highest pay and allowances of a captain in the Navy; and if below the grade of captain have the rank of captain.

That the provisions of law and appropriations for establishing, maintaining, and conducting, and all authorities, jurisdiction, and powers vested in the Bureaus of Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, Equipment, and Yards and Docks shall, except as they conflict with the provisions of this act, remain in full force, and are vested in and made applicable to the Bureau of Ship Construction.

That at each navy-yard and naval station there shall be appointed a civilian, under the title of superintendent of navy-yard or naval station, who shall have entire charge and control and general direction over every department in said yard or station, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, and will be held responsible for the preservation of all buildings and stores contained therein, and for the judicious application of all labor.

That the Bureau of Ordnance shall perform the same duties as the present Bureau of Ordnance, except that the ship design work in connection with the ordnance and the installation thereof on ships, heretofore performed by said Bureau, shall henceforth be performed by the Bureau of Ship Construction, and the shops at navy-yards heretofore under the control of the Bureau of Ordnance are hereby placed under the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Ship Construction.

That the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts shall perform all the duties relating to, requiring for, or preparing provisions, clothing, small stores, and contingent stores of the pay department; the purchase of all supplies for the naval establishment, except supplies for the Marine Corps, and the keeping of a proper system of accounts of the same, and shall have charge of all disbursements of money, both for the Division of Personnel and the Division of Material.

All authority by Congress for officers and men shall be executed by the Secretary of the Navy through the Division of Personnel, and all authority for material shall be executed by the Secretary of the Navy through the Division of Material.

SEC. 6. That the provisions of this act shall take effect and be in force on January 1, 1909, and all moneys heretofore or hereafter appropriated for the use of the Navy, under whatever name of bureaus or divisions, shall be transferred and made available for similar purposes under the new divisions herein established.

SEC. 7. That in making up the estimates of appropriations for the Navy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, the same shall conform to the divisions established by the provisions of this act.

SEC. 8. That section 419 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed, as well as such portions of any and all other acts in conflict with the provisions of this act.

In brief, the bill proposes to divide the Navy into two grand divisions—a Division of Personnel and a Division of Material, the former to be administered, under the Secretary of the Navy, by a First Assistant Secretary, who shall be a naval officer, and the latter by a Second Assistant Secretary, who shall be a civilian.

The Division of Personnel would include all matters relating to the officers and men of the Navy, and the use of the Navy as a weapon. This division would include the Bureau of Navigation, Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, and the Office of the Judge-Advocate-General.

The Division of Material would include the Bureau of Ship Construction, the Bureau of Ordnance, and the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts. The Bureau of Ship Construction would absorb the present bureaus of Yards and Docks, Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, and Equipment. These bureaus, as Secretary Long pointed out, are now doing practically the same character of work and causing much confusion and delay by overlapping each other. Each navy-yard and naval station is to be in charge of a civilian.

In the discussion which followed the introduction of this bill, the significant fact developed that there is a widespread public sentiment throughout the country in favor of some such legislation. This sentiment is reflected in the editorial utterances of the press; and without attempting to quote any considerable number of different newspapers, let me submit one from the East, one from the South, a couple from the Middle West, and one from the West—all from representative papers—to show the public feeling in the different sections of the country on the subject:

NEEDED NAVAL REORGANIZATION.

The unpleasantness which has developed among officials of the Navy Department may furnish the occasion for a study of the organization of that branch of the Government. Its work is still done under a plan adopted in 1842. When Secretary Upshur entered Tyler's cabinet he found that his Department had practically no organization at all. The Secretary was forced to give his time and attention to trifling details of administration. The larger problems had to be neglected because of pressing routine. The plan of centralized control by a single individual under which the Department had developed had broken down because of the multiplicity of details.

On his recommendation the principle of division of labor was introduced. An act of Congress provided for five bureaus in the Navy Department. These were to have charge of navy-yards and docks; construction, equipment, and repairs; provisions and clothing; ordnance and hydrography; and medicine and surgery. There was no arrangement for organizing the heads of these bureaus into a board with corporate powers. Instead each chief was responsible to the Secretary alone. Collective responsibility was entirely lacking.

These five bureaus subsequently were increased in number, with some rearrangement and readjustment of duties. The names of the bureaus suggest at once the possibility of friction and clashing of interest and authority. As the years have gone by these bickerings have made much of the history of Department administration. There has been no strong coordinating principle which has compelled unity of action for the best interests of the Government. A trivial incident frequently has caused unpleasantness, not to be understood without a knowledge of the fundamental weakness of organization.

A department of government which handles a large amount of money annually and is so important a part of the administrative machinery of the nation ought to be organized in accordance with the most approved methods of modern business concerns. The bureaucratic system in itself is all right. The details of the department are too numerous to be handled directly by one man. There is plenty of room for intelligent division of labor. What is needed is coordination of effort.

There has been a great deal of duplication of machinery. As the practically independent bureaus have developed each makes expenditures for things which might be secured with far less outlay under systematic control. There are many places where consolidation and centralization would effect important savings. What ought to be done is to have some of the working principles of industrial combination applied to the department. The experience of any large business house would afford many suggestions in the direction of economical and efficient administration.

The business side of government is being emphasized a good deal nowadays. The individual and the firm use far more judgment and common sense in management than Uncle Sam often does. No department of national administration affords as many opportunities for intelligent business reorganization as the Navy does. If needed reforms should follow the present clash of the bureaus, it would be a good thing.

LEGISLATING FOR THE NAVY.

Two important bills have been brought forward in Congress dealing with the administration of the Navy, one by Mr. HALE in the Senate and the other by Mr. DAWSON, of Iowa, in the House. The former respects the existing bureau organizations and seeks to do away with "general boards," as complicating administration. It affirms the authority which the line has always claimed to sole command of all vessels of the Navy, whatever may be their special purpose. Conservatism is its characteristic, but it may be offered simply as a convenient medium for bringing the whole subject of naval administration before the committee, for Mr. HALE repeatedly disclaimed pride of opinion as to its details or a set purpose to secure all or nothing.

Mr. DAWSON is a member of the House Committee on Naval Affairs, and it is to be presumed that his proposal for securing a greater approach to unity of direction is based upon careful observation. He proposes to consolidate eight bureaus into two, one to deal with the personnel and the other with material, a logical line of cleavage. At the head of one is to be an assistant secretary, who is to be an officer of the line, while another assistant secretary, a civilian, will be in supervision of the second, both to report to the Secretary of the Navy. Here is at least a simpler administration with the authority of the head of the Department emphasized. At present in the Navy Department there are eight bureaus—Yards and Docks, Equipment, Navigation, Ordnance, Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, Supplies and Accounts, Medicine and Surgery. Opportunities for duplications, collisions, and friction abound. Bureau chiefs are human, and the disposition of each to look upon his bureau as a sort of imperium in imperio has recently been illustrated. Many Secretaries of the Navy have been convinced of the necessity of concentration of bureaus, but none has been able to bring it about. Service opinion is divided as to the bureau system, but the bureaus have been so strongly intrenched hitherto that they have felt safe in disregarding criticism. Lack of unity has been the burden of this criticism, epigrammatically pointed by one civilian shipbuilder, who said, "A merchant owner hereabouts builds a vessel at Boston, say. The United States would have the hull designed at Pittsfield, the engines at Provincetown, and the two put together at Worcester, after interventions at points between," an exaggeration, but only an exaggeration of a system which involves a division of labor among half a dozen bureaus.

[From the Cleveland Leader, January 9.]

NAVAL REORGANIZATION.

If the reorganization bill offered by Mr. DAWSON, of Iowa, would really do what its author promises for it—put the Navy "on a business basis as a weapon and an industry"—it ought to be enacted without undue delay. The measure, in part, is aimed at the bureau system that has gained unpleasant notoriety during the past month, and may expect, of course, the active opposition of those who defend the old order of things in the Navy Department. The bureau plan of doing business, indeed, is not abolished by the new bill, but the work is systematized, wasteful duplications of duties are avoided, and the Department brought nearer the degree of working efficiency that one is accustomed to expect in a private enterprise.

[From the Denver Republican, January 9.]

REORGANIZING THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The bureau system in the Navy Department has stirred up so much opposition and called out such severe criticism from men of prominence that Representative DAWSON, of Iowa, a member of the House Committee on Naval Affairs, has introduced a bill for a complete reorganization of the Department.

Investigations made by Mr. DAWSON and other Members of the House have shown the existence of much red tape and expensive duplication of work. It has also been found that the bureaus into which the Department is divided act more or less independently of one another, and that as a result there is not merely duplication of work, but also much friction.

Mr. DAWSON'S plan is to make two great divisions of the Department, each to be under the direction of an Assistant Secretary. One of these will have to do with the personnel of the Navy and the other with material matters. This is the system which has given much satisfaction in the French navy, and it is believed that by consolidating several of the bureaus and making them directly responsible to a single head much of the existing ground of criticism will be removed.

If nothing more were accomplished by the proposed changes, the breaking up of the old bureaucratic system would of itself justify a reorganization. The constant tendency of such a system is to crystallize, and thus become indifferent to outside criticism. The longer it endures the more fixed it becomes, until in the course of years traditional methods acquire almost the force of law, and subordinate officials and employees conclude that nothing can dislodge them from their places or compel them to improve their ways of doing business.

A thorough reorganization of the Department would put an end to such dreams and make possible the introduction of improvements, together with a great reduction in expense.

[From the Fort Worth (Tex.) Record, January 10, 1908.]

NAVY REORGANIZATION.

Representative DAWSON, of Iowa, a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, has introduced a bill in the House of Representatives having for its object the reorganization of the Navy Department and the destruction of the bureau system, the workings of which recently prevented the sailing of the hospital ship Relief with the fleet bound for the Pacific.

Mr. DAWSON'S bill is modeled on the workings of the French naval establishment, and provides two grand divisions of work—the "personnel" and the "matériel"—all matters relating to one of these general subjects going to that division, the two divisions being so organized as to preclude the possibility of conflict between them, and each to be under the direction of an Assistant Secretary, responsible to the member of the Cabinet holding the naval portfolio.

The plan is said to command the unanimous approval of the Naval Committee in the House, and to be the outcome of a whole summer's investigation of the defects in the existing bureau system, covering all the navy-yards between Norfolk and Portsmouth.

Under the present plan of having eight bureaus no correlation of work is possible. Each bureau chief has his own plans worked out without consultation with the head of any other bureau, and the result is constant duplication of work with accompanying friction. The committee came to the conclusion that of the $10,000,000 expended each year at the navy-yards 10 per cent was wasted through unnecessary duplication.

It needs no argument to point out that the Navy naturally divides itself into a division of personnel and a division of material.

The personnel, embracing the officers and men, comprehends the military part of the Navy. The division of material just as naturally comprehends the industrial side of the Navy. It seems logical to me that the military end of it should be under the direction of a military officer who is provided for by this new assistant secretaryship. These two Assistant Secretaries, one in control of the military arm of the service, the other in control of the business and industrial branch of the service, working under the general direction of the Secretary of the Navy, would bring about that correlation of the bureaus which is so essential to good results. Instead of eight heads of bureaus, having authority to issue orders of the same force and effect as orders from the Secretary of the Navy, there would be one central head of each of these two grand divisions and the responsibility would be lodged in one place. I would take the Bureau of Construction and Repair, which has charge of the hulls of the ships; the Bureau of Steam Engineering, which has charge of the propelling machinery of the ship, and the Bureau of Equipment, which supplies the necessary equipment of the ship, and include them in a single bureau. Then you will have some correlation between these different bureaus engaged in the same sort of business, and whose lines in the intricacies of modern shipbuilding are constantly crossing to the embarrassment of the Department and the Navy itself.

I need add nothing more, I think, to the arguments of Secretary Long, which I have already read, as to the wisdom of consolidating those bureaus which deal with the material of the ship. The present divided authority respecting a single unit of naval administration abounds in opportunities for duplication, collisions, and frictions.

I do not claim any perfection for this bill, but I do claim that it is based upon right principles; that it makes a reasonable and logical division of the work of the Navy Department; that it would effect the consolidation and the concentration in a way to result in a great saving to the Government, and that it would bring about that correlation and that coordination which is now so sadly lacking in that Department of the Government.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How long has this complex condition existed?

Mr. DAWSON. Since 1842. Congress passed a law at that time fixing five bureaus, and at a later period, during the civil war, three more bureaus were added, making eight in all.

There is another provision in this bill which I believe will commend itself to the judgment of men who have given any thought or attention to this subject, and that is the provision which places each navy-yard under civilian management. As it is now a naval officer who is entitled to perhaps two years' shore duty is assigned to one of the navy-yards or naval stations, and at the end of that period he is sent away. Thus you rob those navy-yards, which are only great industrial concerns, of that continuity of service which is so essential in the economical and efficient conduct of a business enterprise.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Would this complex condition exist if the Government made its own ships at its own yards?

Mr. DAWSON. The question of building ships at navy-yards has no direct relation to the administration of the Department.

Besides that, the average naval officer who is assigned to these navy-yards in the capacity of a superintendent has had no training as a business man. He is trained as a fighting man. I remember on our trip last summer a distinguished naval officer explained the situation to our committee with commendable frankness. After he had set forth how many hundreds of thousands of dollars they wanted us to appropriate for that particular yard, he was asked if he could suggest any way by which we could economize at that yard. In answer this distinguished naval officer very frankly said that he was not educated as an economist, but as a naval officer; that he was not educated as to how to save money, but that all his training in the service had been as to how to spend money.

And so it goes at these navy-yards. For the most part they are under the control and direction of naval officers, who are temporarily assigned to duty there.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, can the gentleman tell us how much will be saved by the adoption of his plan?

Mr. DAWSON. I can not give the figures in dollars and cents, but I believe it would be a very large sum. I saw a statement in the newspapers not long ago to the effect that a naval officer who had examined into the subject believed that if the service were put upon a business basis we could at least save the price of one battle ship a year, and maybe more.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is about $10,000,000 is it not?

Mr. DAWSON. Yes.

I do not claim any originality in this matter, as this question of remedying the defects in the bureau system is one which has engaged the serious attention of Secretaries of the Navy and of naval officers for many years. As far back as 1885 William C. Whitney, then Secretary of the Navy, called attention to the inadequacy of the system and recommended a reorganization.

Since that time we find the question of naval administration and Department organization treated in numerous papers in the proceedings of the United States Naval Institute by many eminent officers. In 1901 the prize essay of the United States Naval Institute was one written by Lieut. John Hood, and I intend to print this at the end of my remarks, together with brief extracts from the favorable comment made in the discussion of his essay by such eminent officers as Captain Chadwick, Captian Goodrich, and Lieutenant Chandler. In the proceedings of the institute for 1905 we find two very luminous papers on this subject—one by Rear-Admiral Stephen B. Luce and the other by Naval Constructor T. G. Roberts—and I shall include portions of both these papers as an appendix to my remarks. The remedies suggested by these officers are in a large measure along the same lines as those proposed in the bill to which I have referred.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am enjoying the gentleman's speech very much. Will he tell the committee why it is that Congress has not adopted this reform? It looks to me like a very sound, business proposition, and I want to congratulate the gentleman on putting it so plainly to the House.

Mr. DAWSON. I will say to my friend from Tennessee, that the Naval Committee at this time has started upon a plan looking to consolidation and to better administration in the Navy Department.

Two or three years ago the Naval Committee decided upon the consolidation of all of the power plants at these various navy-yards, and since that time the appropriations have been made with a view to having one central power plant at each navy-yard instead of a separate power plant for each of these four or five different bureaus.

I am very glad to say that after this subject of naval administration was brought to the front at the beginning of this year the Navy Deparment set about to effect a consolidation of the duplicated shops in the navy-yards of the country. They began at the Brooklyn yard, about the middle of February, by consolidating the four paint shops, the five carpenter shops, and the five blacksmith shops under the Bureau of Construction and Repair, and the three coppersmith shops, and the three iron and brass foundries under the Bureau of Steam Engineering. The general policy of the Department in this concentration at the different yards is to consolidate these various shops under the jurisdiction of that Bureau having the greatest number of employees in the particular trade.

I want to commend Assistant Secretary Newberry for his business judgment in this movement. The consolidation has been extended to all the navy-yards along the Atlantic coast, and is, I am told, to be extended also through the yards down the Pacific coast.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the gentleman will pardon me, did I understand him a moment ago when I understood him to say that a naval officer who was the man who purchased the material for the shop confessed in effect that it was a business man's business to do that, and that he was not a business man?

Mr. DAWSON. The man to whom I have referred happened to be not merely at the head of a Bureau in a navy-yard, but he was the commandant of the yard. He was not merely the superintendent of a single bureau, but the general superintendent of the entire yard.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I can see how that very easily would make a ship exceedingly expensive.

Mr. DAWSON. This action of the Navy Department, in my judgment, is a step in the right direction. I have no doubt that this consolidation of shops will result in a considerable saving in the long run. While it is a step in the right direction, it does not go to the root of the fundamental question involved in the matter of naval reorganization. It may, and doubtless will, dispense with the duplication of shops and tools at the various navy-yards for the time being, but we will still have at every one of these navy-yards the four separate bureaus, each clamoring for appropriations from Congress. We will still have those conflicts of jurisdiction and authority—exemplified in that instance cited, where three bureaus have jurisdiction over the installation of the fire-control apparatus on a ship—and other conflicts like it. This same question came up a number of years ago, and the Secretary of the Navy, not satisfied with the business methods at our navy-yards, had the subject investigated by a competent board of officers. I desire to quote the concluding statement of this board, made after a thorough and exhaustive inquiry into the whole subject. They say:

> We conclude that to organize our navy-yards on a just and permanent basis, to consolidate their several plants, to introduce thrift in the management, and promptness in the methods of doing the work, with a proper system of accountability—to secure, in short, in each of our yards unification, method, and dispatch, with an administration of its affairs agreeable to the principles of business as understood in civil life—it is absolutely necessary to begin within the Navy Department itself.

The subject, as I stated in the beginning, is one of tremendous magnitude. It is not one which can be worked out in a day or a month. The Naval Committee has already taken hold of it, as I explained to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr.

GAINES], and I hope that the subject will receive the thoughtful and earnest consideration and investigation by the Members of this House, in order that in the end we may work out for the Navy Department a system of administration that will be businesslike in its management, and will bring the United States Navy to a higher standard of efficiency than it has yet attained.

I am not one of those who would revolutionize the Department in an attempt to correct the present defects in the system, but I believe that we should go forward step by step until we have secured that measure of unity, corelation, and cooperation in the organization that will develop and make certain the highest possible standard of efficiency and economy. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed all his time.

APPENDIX.

[From Proceedings of the United States Naval Institute, March, 1901.]

NAVAL ADMINISTRATION AND ORGANIZATION—MOTTO: THE COUNTRY—THE SERVICE—THE INDIVIDUAL.

[By Lieut. John Hood, United States Navy.]

It is with considerable hesitation that the writer selects so broad and comprehensive a subject as naval administration and organization for the theme of an essay, but existing conditions leave so much to be desired in both the administration and organization of the Navy that any honest effort for improvement, however imperfect, may do some good, and at least will do no harm.

The treatment of so extensive a subject in a limited space permits of only very general ideas being given and very broad lines being drawn, and the remarks that follow are not offered as a structure complete in all its parts, but rather as a mere framework of suggestion to those who have the interests of the service at heart, in the hope that abler hands may take up the work and carry it to full completion.

As it stands to-day the Navy could hardly be said to be more than an aggregation of individuals, without proper cohesion or unity of purpose. The individuals are excellent in themselves, whether they be men or ships; but something more than an aggregation of them is needed to make the service the complete, harmonious, homogeneous whole that it should be, working with one purpose for the advancement and glory of the country. That is the final end for the attainment of which all lovers of the service should strive, and the remarks and suggestions that follow are a feeble effort in that direction.

ADMINISTRATION.

Naval administration, to the mind of the writer, includes all things pertaining to the direction of the naval policy of the country; the organization of the Navy Department, or central office of naval administration, and its apportionment into the proper divisions and subdivisions; the direction and control of the naval personnel, and the formation, direction, and control of fleets.

Up to the present time it would be more than bold to say there has been any naval administration at all in the true sense of the term. Certainly there has been no fixed naval policy, nor any logical, consecutive system of development. As new needs have arisen from time to time, a new bureau or a new office has been created here and there and grafted on the whole system without any proper coordination or logical plan for future development. The result has been a heterogeneous mass of old and new, without cohesion of parts or unity of design, and with frequent rivalries between the parts where there should have been nothing but cooperation. The law of its growth has been the expediency of the moment, and reason, logic, and foresight have had little or no part in its development. It may be said to exist only by the force of custom, and to attain any degree of efficiency only by the strength and character of many eminent bureau chiefs.

The spirit of following the law of expediency, rather than logical plan and system, permeates the entire naval establishment, but more especially its administration, and has done more to delay true naval growth than any other cause. It is founded on the moral weaknesses of some, the personal ambitions and jealousies of others, and the want of foresight and ideas of false economy of all; and the sooner it is swept aside, and reason and logic substituted therefor, the better it will be for both the country and the service.

It may be accepted as an axiom that all creations—whether of the intellect or the hands—that are destined to live and bear good fruit are founded on reason and the natural order of things; and since we wish our naval administration to be a living force in itself, and not dependent entirely on the force and character of passing individuals, let us see if it is not possible to organize it on a natural and logical basis, to the end that naval development may be continuous and progressive, despite the shortcomings and failures of any individual heads or chiefs.

It is a necessary consequence of our form of government that the official head of the Navy shall be a civilian who usually goes into office nonconversant with naval duties, customs, and traditions. While this has its disadvantages, in that it frequently exposes questions of a purely technical character to the decision of one necessarily ignorant of their bearings, it has the undoubtedly great advantage of supplying the Navy with a head free from the contamination of service cliques and corps, and of giving it an impartial arbitrator in service disagreements. In many ways it would tend much more to thorough efficiency if the head of the service knew and felt all its aims and needs, and were in full personal sympathy with it; but this same result can be attained, to a great extent, by the proper selection of subordinates; and our system of placing a nonnaval and nonmilitary man at the head of the Navy is, perhaps, the wisest that could be designed. However, whether it be wise or unwise, the system will always be followed, as long as our Government lasts, and further discussion of it is useless, and we will proceed to the consideration of what improvement may be accomplished under him.

As at present constituted, the affairs of the Navy Department are administered by a number of independent, or semi-independent, bureaus and offices, sometimes working together, but more frequently at odds, and with little or no military subordination and sequence or natural and logical groupings. If the matter be looked at broadly, from either a statesmanlike or military point of view, the whole comprehensive subject of naval administration naturally and logically divides itself into two, and only two, great divisions: First, that of the personnel; and second, that of material. Therefore, logically and naturally, the affairs of the Navy should be administered under these two heads, and under these two only, for all division of responsibility beyond that required by reason and logic tends to weaken the responsibility and promote carelessness, diffusion, and general inefficiency.

The Division of the Personnel should comprise all that relates to the naval personnel, its training, discipline, and detail; all that relates to preparation and plans for war and action; all that relates to the direction and control of commissioned ships and fleets; or, generally, all that pertains to the Navy as a military and fighting organization.

The Division of Material should comprise all that relates to the design, construction, equipment, and maintenance of ships, ordnance, machinery, yards, docks, etc.; or, generally, everything that pertains to the creation and maintenance "inbeing" of the most efficient and largest fleet allowed by the laws.

Just as naturally as the whole administrative system divides itself into these two great heads, these divide themselves into certain subdivisions that will be discussed under their appropriate heads.

PERSONNEL.

Taking the divisions in the order of their importance, we will consider first the personnel. This division should have for its chief an officer who would be the true military head of the Navy. He should be carefully selected from the highest grade of the line, and, as chief of personnel, should be the ranking officer of the Navy. He should be the chief adviser of the Secretary in all matters of naval policy, and should direct and be responsible for all the matters above enumerated as comprising the Division of Personnel.

No one thing has done more to foster laxity of discipline, develop insubordination, and check the growth of a proper military spirit and "esprit de corps" than the want of this military head, and until such is established all hope of thorough reform and of molding the Navy into as perfect a fighting machine as human nature permits is vain.

Heretofore the duties of a semimilitary head have been performed by the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, but his scope has been far too limited and his position too anomalous to accomplish much good in a military sense. What is needed is a genuine military head, recognized by the law and by the service as such, and such a head should be the Chief of Personnel.

For the administration of naval affairs relating to personnel the Division of Personnel should be composed of the following branches or subdivisions:

"1. The General Staff: This most important of the subdivisions of personnel is yet all to be formed, except such small parts of its duties and functions as have heretofore been performed by the War College and Office of Naval Intelligence. From the nature of the requirements of a general staff its formation in completed perfection can only be an accomplishment of time. Hence its development should be begun at once."

The official and legal recognition of a general staff and the selection of a proper chief, with a limited corps of assistants and with the Office of Naval Intelligence and the War College placed under him, would be a long step in the right direction.

The Chief of the General Staff should be next in rank in the personnel branch of the service to the Chief of Personnel, and should occupy toward that chief the same position that the latter does to the Secretary. He should be the chief adviser of and replace the Chief of Personnel in case of absence, sickness, or temporary disability.

"2. Bureau of Naval Organization and of Detail: This bureau should have charge of the organization of ships' complements, of squadrons and fleets, of all drills and systems of military instruction, of keeping the records of all officers and men in the naval service, and of the detail of all officers and men to ships and stations for the utilization of the varying talents of all to the best interests of the service."

Perhaps there is no subject connected with naval administration that requires more tact and fine judgment than the detailing of officers and men to fill the positions for which they are best fitted and for the best interests of the Government, and there is none that has usually received less attention, especially in the lower grades. Our present system requires all men to be all things, and attempts to eliminate human nature from the most human of all problems—the control and handling of men. It would be difficult to find an officer of twenty years' experience who has not at some time in his career sailed with an executive officer who could not execute, a navigator who could not navigate, and a watch officer who could neither control the crew nor handle the ship. Each of these officers may have been excellent on some other line of duty, but the system required that he should fill a position for which he was unfitted, to the loss of discipline and efficiency or the hazarding of the lives of a ship's company and the safety of the ship. The duties of the Navy are so varied that there is room for talent of all kinds, and the "detail" duty of this bureau should be one that receives the most careful consideration and the personal supervision of its chief.

"3. The Office of Naval and Military Law and Discipline: This Office should have cognizance of all matters pertaining to the administration of law and justice in the Navy and the enforcement of discipline under the laws. It is essentially a branch of the personnel, and should therefore be placed under the direction of its chief. The head of the office should be known as Judge-Advocate-General, and should be chosen from the active officers of the Navy well versed in military law and in close touch with naval customs and the needs of naval discipline. This close touch with naval customs and needs as being essential to the efficient administration of naval justice and discipline as a knowledge of the law, the term of office of the Judge-Advocate-General should never exceed eight years, and would be better limited to four."

One of the first duties of this Office should be the preparation for submission to Congress of a new code of laws for the administration of justice in minor offenses, the clearer separation of minor and grave offenses, and the general simplification of the administration of law as conducted in the Navy to-day. The necessity for this simplification and of the proper classification of offenses and punishments by law is at the present time one of the most urgent needs of the Navy for the maintenance of discipline.

"4. The Hydrographic Office: This Office, as now, should have charge of the collection and dissemination of nautical information of all kinds and the preparation of the charts, books, etc., needed for the proper navigation of the active fleet in all parts of the world. The work of this Office is purely professional and has no connection whatever with the material of ships. Therefore it is difficult to see why it should be placed under an essentially material branch of the service, as at present, when logically it should come under the control of the division that should naturally apportion and direct its work."

MATERIAL.

Before taking up the detailed discussion of this great division of the Navy it might be well to preface it with some general remarks on the advisability of its consolidation.

As the Department is at present organized, the affairs of the material of the Navy are administered under the Secretary by a number of equal coordinate independent heads, frequently disagreeing among themselves from that ineradicable trait in human nature that causes almost every individual to magnify the importance of the part of any joint work designed by himself. These disagreements—most usually on technical questions and arising from honest differences of opinion—must be referred for decision to the Secretary, who, however great his ability, has rarely the technical education and training that would fit him to decide them to the best advantage.

The parts of a modern ship are so various, and involve so many distinct professions, that many minds are necessarily engaged in evolving the finished vessel. The constructor, the engineer, the ordnance officer, have each and all been necessary to form the completed whole, and many compromises have been made between them from the inception of the plan to the time the finished ship is ready for service. That in the adjustment of these compromises many disagreements should arise is only human; and, in the opinion of the writer, their settlement, and the general building of the Navy, would be much facilitated if there were a common head to all the branches engaged in work on material with sufficient technical knowledge and experience of ships to decide the question intelligently, and with sufficient authority to settle them. Not only would the work be much facilitated, but the Secretary would be relieved from a most onerous duty, and one that he must have frequently felt himself unqualified to fill.

Although men of the high attainments, broad technical knowledge, and administrative ability necessary to fill successfully the responsible position this head must occupy are not common in any profession, there are, and always will be, a rare few in the Navy, as there are in all other great professions; and from these few the head or chief of material should be chosen. It is the same type of men that are found filling the positions of general managers and superintendents of all the great industrial enterprises of civil life.

Though a chief of specialists, he need not be a specialist himself, but must be, however, a man of extensive mechanical ability, and of broad experience of ships at sea under all conditions of service; and, above all, of great executive ability.

He should by law be the officer next in rank in the Navy to the Chief of Personnel, and should be the chief adviser of the Secretary in all matters relating to the creation and maintenance of fleets, and should have control and direction of all navy-yards and repair stations.

Consolidated under this authority, instead of being the independent coordinate powers they are to-day, should be the following subdivisions:

"1. The Bureau of Construction: This Bureau should have cognizance of all the affairs of material relating to the design, construction, and repair of ships, docks, and stations, and should have the care of all navy-yards and repair stations. Its chief and assistants should be constructors and constructing engineers of the highest type obtainable; and the chief should bear the same relation to the Chief of Material that the Chief bears to the Secretary."

The present Bureau of Yards and Docks, and the system that has heretofore prevailed of laying out and designing our navy-yards and stations under many heads, would seem to be illogical, and has certainly led to much unnecessary expense and confusion. The placing of the whole navy-yard system under the one head that controls the great bulk of the work done in them would seem to be reasonable and would undoubtedly lead to economy, efficiency, and to the adoption of a systematic plan in the arrangement of shops and buildings.

"2. The Bureau of Engineering: This Bureau should comprise everything relating to the design, construction, and management of all machinery in the Navy, both ashore and afloat, except that relating to ordnance. Its Chief and assistants should be mechanical engineers of the highest order; and, to be such, can be nothing else.

"3. The Bureau of Ordnance: This Bureau should have cognizance of the design, building, and care of all ordnance, ordnance material, and appliances, and of all armor used in the Navy; and have control of all naval gun foundries and proving grounds."

The handling and management of naval guns and all their appurtenances being distinctly among the primary duties of the line, the Chief and assistants of this Bureau should be chosen from that branch of the service from among those who have made a specialty of ordnance matters by natural predilection.

Moreover, excellence in design and construction can only be attained by the application of the intimate knowledge and experience gained in the actual use of the guns and their appliances in all the varying conditions of active service. This knowledge and experience can only be gained at sea; and therefore the ordnance expert must be also a seagoing officer and should never be segregated from the seagoing line into a distinct and individual corps.

"4. The Bureau of Equipment: This Bureau should control the fitting and arrangement of the entire equipment of vessels except that of ordnance and machinery."

The Chief and assistants of this Bureau should be taken from the line of the Navy, as full knowledge of the necessities of ship equipment can only be acquired by those who actually go to sea in ships and learn from daily experience, in the varying conditions of sea life, which is actually needed for thorough efficiency.

In addition to the subdivisions enumerated above the administration of the Navy requires two other important branches, which are not so logically classible as being wholly of either the personnel or material as those already mentioned, and are yet not of the primary importance that requires the establishment of separate and independent divisions in the administration for the proper conduct of their administrative duties. These two branches comprise the duties now administered by the Bureaus of Medicine and Surgery and of Supplies and Accounts.

While the peculiar duties of these two branches render them both more or less independent of the natural classification of all the other branches, they are both of a subordinate character, and are adjuncts rather than primary powers in the administration. Therefore, it would seem more logical and in the right order of things to class them under the one or the other of the two great divisions with which they are the more nearly assimilated, than to form two more divisions of the first order in the administration for two essentially subordinate branches.

The duties of the surgical branch of the Navy bring it in close alliance with the personnel, and, therefore, it would seem logical to class that branch with the personnel, and the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery as the fifth subdivision of personnel. It should be organized as at the present time, except that it should act through the military head of the Navy instead of as an independent power.

On the other hand, the pay branch of the Navy in the purchase, transportation, and care of all the material of the Navy is, in its administrative duties, far more closely allied with the material; and hence the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts should be classed as the fifth subdivision of that great division in the organization of the administration.

No other branches of the naval administration than those indicated above are either necessary or logical; and the division into the two—and only two—great divisions of the personnel and material would seem to be so natural and conducive to efficiency and unity of action, that the administration must long have since been formed on these lines but for the continued reign of the law of expediency and the influences of personal ambitions and of politics.

The suggested organization of the naval administration, then, is:

"First. The head, the Secretary of the Navy.

"Second. The Division of Personnel, whose Chief would be the military head of the naval service, and who would be the chief adviser of the Secretary in matters of naval policy and in all matters affecting the Navy as a military entity.

"Third. The Division of Material, whose Chief would be the chief adviser of the Secretary in all matters relating to the construction and maintenance of fleets, yards, docks, and stations."

For the consideration of questions of naval policy of a wider and more deliberate nature, the Chief of Personnel, the Chief of the General Staff, the Chief of the Bureau of Detail and Organization, and their principal assistants should form a permanent board on policy and naval strategy, under the presidency of the Chief of Personnel, for the assistance of the Secretary in creating and formulating the naval plans of the nation.

For the assistance of the Secretary in formulating plans for the creation and maintenance of the fleet, for deciding the types and sizes of ships, their armaments, speed, etc., or, generally, everything connected with putting "in being" the most efficient fleet possible, the Chief of Material, Chief Constructor, Chief of Engineering, Chief of Ordnance, and Chief of Equipment should form a permanent board on construction, under the presidency of the Chief of Material, who should have the deciding voice.

The Secretary would thus, at all times, have at his disposal the experience and advice of the chiefs of the two great divisions of the naval administration; and in matters of graver import, requiring further deliberation and discussion, should convene either the Board of Policy and Strategy or the Board of Construction, or both, according to the nature of the question.

In general the Secretary should hold the chiefs of the two great divisions responsible for the proper performance of all matters relating to their respective divisions, and leave them to hold their subordinates to a like responsibility, for responsibility, properly carried, is the sure test of efficiency. It can be properly carried only when it proceeds from the head down, for in any efficient organization the head is always responsible.

It would be impossible to develop a complete scheme of naval administration in the narrow limits of an essay, and this branch of the subject-matter of the title will be closed with the few broad suggestions offered above, for the majority of which no claim of originality is made. But it would seem that an administration organized and developed on the lines suggested would be following the laws of logic and reason, would prove efficient, lead to a unity of purpose, develop the best in all branches, and promote a spirit of emulation and military "esprit de corps."

DISCUSSION.

Capt. F. E. Chadwick, United States Navy: I wish first to thank Lieutenant Hood for a most thoughtful, able, and philosophic paper. The organization of administration has always been a weak point in our system, and it has been weakest where, by the complex nature of the subject, it should be strongest—in the Navy. Nothing could be more haphazard, disconnected, and, so to speak, offhand, than the law establishing our present organization. * * * I agree, in the main, most cordially with the author's views.

Capt. Caspar F. Goodrich, United States Navy: * * * An old officer once said to me that the bureau system was not so bad in itself, but that the Navy Department needed some office, or officer, or commission, to knock together the heads of the bureau chiefs and make them agree. This idea would appear to have been in the essayist's mind as he wrote. The bureaus were originally intended to divide the Navy's civil business among them, and so relieve the Secretary of much of the burden of his financial and other responsibilities. To-day the bureau chiefs are so overwhelmed with the minutiæ of their several charges that they can not properly give sufficient time to the consideration of those broad questions which concern the service as a whole. The essayist's plan may not meet with universal acceptance, but it offers at least a well-reasoned means of reaching an end which is generally conceded to be greatly needed. * * * To combine all that concerns the personnel under one head and all that concerns the material under another head must commend itself to the judgment.

Lieut. L. H. Chandler, United States Navy: I find myself in hearty accord with the essayist's views as far as the question of administration is concerned, and I believe that such an arrangement as he describes would, in general, prove an ideal one.

THE DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY—MOTTO: "TO IMPROVE THE STREAM BEGIN AT ITS SOURCE."

[By Rear-Admiral Stephen B. Luce, United States Navy.]

The discussion as to the best form of naval government has been carried on in these pages for some years past, but with indifferent results.

Let us now place the Department itself on the stand and learn from original sources what it has to say in its own behalf. To this end we may bring the testimony of some of the distinguished gentlemen who have presided over the Navy during the past few years. They are the most competent judges of the workings of their own office. They can speak with an authority vouchsafed to few, for each Secretary of the Navy was in turn the Department. By concatenating certain of these expert opinions (not all, indeed, for that would far exceed our limits) we may be enabled, each one for himself, to judge of the true character of the Department, as revealed by itself; of its ability to map out a far-reaching and comprehensive naval policy; of its capabilities for governing and guiding the military operations of the fleet, and of the degree of efficiency and economy secured by this particular form of administration.

First, as to the composition of the Department.

The act of April 30, 1798, which called into existence the Department of the Navy, provided for a Secretary of the Navy, whose duty it was to execute such orders as he should receive from the President; for a principal clerk, and for such other clerks as might be thought necessary.

Not a very complicated piece of machinery, perhaps, but it illustrates the very crude notions of that day relative to naval organization.

To-day we find the Navy Department composed of one Secretary of the Navy, an Assistant Secretary, eight bureaus, a Judge-Advocate-General, and a proportionate number of clerks.

About twenty years ago the Secretary of the Navy, not satisfied with the business methods of our navy-yards, propounded the following query: "Whether a given navy-yard is fully equipped with the necessary appliances for the prompt and economical execution of such work as may be required; and, if not, what will be required to place it in proper condition for the probable demands of war?"

A portion of the answer of the board of officers to whom the question was addressed is given herewith at length, as it goes to the very root of the matter and shows clearly that the unbusinesslike methods which obtain in our navy-yards have their origin in the defects inherent in the Navy Department. The logical conclusion—the conclusion from which we can not escape—is, as there stated, that reforms in our navy-yard methods must begin in the Department itself.

After making certain recommendations, the report of the board continues: "The third query invites an expression of our views as to whether 'any improvements can be made in the system of performing the work at the navy-yards which will promote efficiency and reduce expenses.'"

Answer: "To a proper understanding of the subject it should be stated that the present wasteful extravagance in employing so great an excess of nonproducers, and the inefficient system of doing business which has for years past been steadily increasing in our navy-yards, is but the natural outgrowth of the constitution of the Navy Department itself. There can be no manner of doubt of this. Each navy-yard is made up of a number of separate and comparatively independent establishments, little principalities, as it were, each owing allegiance to its own sovereign, the chief of the bureau to which it belongs. The heads of departments of a navy-yard have extensive and responsible duties and a large patronage, and are naturally jealous of the interference of anyone but their own chiefs.

"Thus each department has been gradually building itself up so as to be independent of all other departments, and is constantly striving to do all its own work. Each of the principal departments has its own body of artisans, its own machinery, its own steam generators, and its own peculiar method of doing business. As an illustration, we take from official 'schedule of wages' (Form 9) of civil engineer's office the following ratings: Boiler makers, boiler makers' helpers, calkers, coopers, cabinetmakers, core makers, ship joiners, ship carpenters, machinists, machinists' helpers, molders, oakum pickers, and pattern makers—a little shipyard in itself.

"In this way it has come that some of our yards are filled up with machinery far beyond their actual needs, and it is no exaggeration to say that there is to-day enough machinery of various kinds in either the New York or the Boston yard to do the work of its own particular class of the entire Navy during peace. We habitually speak of a private shipyard as a 'plant;' but each of our national shipyards is a segregation of plants, each having its own separate organization and each its own internal regulations. Many illustrations might be given to show how, through the want of concert of action among these several plants, useless and vexatious delays occur, to say nothing of the waste of time and of public money due to such diffusion.

"To make such radical changes as we propose in our memorandum was no easy task, nor did we expect that they could be effected without considerable friction, not to say opposition; but supposing the changes to be made on the basis laid down by the Commission, it is hardly to be hoped that under present conditions they will be permanent, for whatever changes may be introduced now, and howsoever beneficial they may be, still the same causes remaining in active operation must inevitably produce the same result and in time restore the system of independent plants with all its attendant evils. Hence we conclude that to organize our navy-yards on a just and permanent basis, to consolidate their several plants, to introduce thrift in the management and promptness in the methods of doing the work, with a proper system of accountability—to secure, in short, in each of our yards unification, method, economy, and dispatch, with an administration of its affairs agreeable to the principles of business as understood in civil life—it is absolutely necessary to begin with the Navy Department itself.

"Upon the consummation of so desirable an event, which need not necessarily change the general character of the present organization of the Department, the scheme for consolidation, the proper classification of duties, and the abolition of all unnecessary employees in the navy-yards can be carried into effect without difficulty and with the essential element of permanency insured."

One copy of this report was sent by the Secretary of the Navy to the Senate, under date of January 14, 1884, and one copy to the House of Representatives. It was referred to the respective Committees on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed. It is clear, therefore, that the members of those committees were fully informed on the subject. It does not appear, however, that it elicited any attention or that the charges it contained have ever been refuted or a single statement challenged.

On the contrary, during a succeeding administration and one of a different political complexion, the Secretary of the Navy himself took up the subject and exposed, with relentless candor, the wasteful extravagance which characterized the business methods of the Navy Department.

"It must be evident that there is something radically wrong with the Department," wrote the Secretary of the Navy in his annual report to Congress under date of November 30, 1885. And he adds: "The universal dissatisfaction is the conclusive proof of this." He then proceeds to dissect the bureau system as it then existed with merciless precision and gives to the world a "record of mismanagement, of wasteful expenditure, of injudicious and ill-advised disposition of public moneys," such as should have led to immediate and salutary reforms.

For the seventeen years preceding his administration over seventy-five millions of money had been expended "on the construction, repair, equipment, and ordnance of vessels, which sum, with a very slight exception, has been substantially thrown away."

To illustrate "the follies of the Department," the Secretary cites the case of the Omaha, an old wooden vessel of obsolete type, that was rebuilt at a cost that would have paid for a modern steel ship of the same rating. The curious part of this piece of extravagance was that the responsibility was so diffused over several bureaus that it could not be laid at the door of anyone in particular.

In respect to navy-yards the extravagant system is fully detailed—"a state of things which," the Secretary adds, "it is almost impossible to correct under the present organization of the Department." These last words, coming, as they did, from a Secretary of the Navy of marked ability, are significant, and fully confirm the views of the Board hereinbefore quoted. And, finally, to secure desired results, "a reform to our organization is indispensable."

Even with such overwhelming evidence of its necessity no reorganization was attempted, but an improvement in the methods of transacting business of the Department by placing purchases of the several bureaus under the Paymaster-General was introduced.

The next administration succeeding took up the same question of the organization of the Department. Under date of November 30, 1889, the Secretary laid bare the glaring defects of the bureau system in language so clear and pointed that the wonder is it failed to attract the attention of Congress.

"The details of administering the Navy, as an existing force," he reports, "its vessels in commission, its officers, and its crews, were scattered, without system or coherence, among a variety of offices, bureaus, and boards. The assignment of officers to duty, and, to a limited extent, the movements of ships in commission, were in charge of an 'office of detail,' at the head of which was the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, which Bureau was, at the same time, supplying compasses, chronometers, and navigating instruments, electric-light plants, ship's libraries, and other miscellaneous articles." The Secretary then proceeds to show how business is distributed among other bureaus and adds: "To all these fragments of authority there was no central unity of direction except such as could be given by the personal attention of the Secretary, to the exclusion of that broad and general supervision over all executive business which is required by a Department as comprehensive as the Navy; and cases were not infrequent where a ship received simultaneous orders from three separate bureaus, which were so directly contradictory that it was impossible to execute them."

"To attempt to reach a conclusion by means of three coordinate bureaus working independently," remarks the Secretary of the Navy, "without unity of direction, and without any established organization by which differences may be harmonized and an agreement reached, must produce delay, confusion, changes of plans, and additional expense. To remedy this serious defect, the only plan which the law admitted was adopted." This was the origin of the Board of Construction, created by General Order No. 372, in 1889.

In 1895 the Secretary still further simplified the business methods of the Navy Department, but left the question of reorganization untouched.

But with all this public exposure of the fallacy of bureau methods, and with the shameful case of the Omaha as a warning, equally unfortunate were the cases of the Puritan and Terror, monitors, ten years later. The hulls were rebuilt by one bureau and the worn-out engines and defective boilers were allowed to remain by another bureau, so that in the Spanish war these otherwise fine vessels, with their high military value, could not steam fast enough to "get out of their own way." The warning furnished by the Omaha was disregarded.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy of November, 1903, alludes to the defective organization in his Department in no uncertain terms. He repeats substantially what was said twenty years ago, of eight bureaus working independently of each other: "The distribution of business among bureaus independent of and unrelated to each other (except through the action of the Secretary) unquestionably creates a condition out of which grow conflicts of jurisdiction between the bureaus, sometimes injurious, and a tendency to consider the interests of the bureaus rather than the interests of the Navy. The division of business in the bureaus * * * extends to the navy-yards, and even, to some extent, to ships in commission. This leads sometimes to excessive and cumbersome organization and lack of harmony of effort, resulting from the fact that there is no coordination, except by the voluntary action of bureau chiefs, short of the Secretary's office itself." And more to the same effect.

After exposing the defects of the existing state of affairs, the Secretary goes on to make a distinct recommendation looking to an improvement in the constitution of his office. This led to a state of affairs which can hardly find a parallel in the naval history of any country.

The insufficiency of the personnel of the Secretary's own office had long been felt. The necessity to a Secretary, fresh from civil life, of an intimate and confidential relationship with some one officer or officers of rank and asknowledged fitness for the position, had been fully acknowledged. This phase of the question was very clearly stated in the report of the Secretary of the Navy in 1885. Moreover, the very large increase in our naval establishment and correspondingly increased expenditures, together with the greater military value which now attaches to our squadrons, imperatively demand that the office of the Secretary of the Navy should no longer be left without a professional assistant. However well that arrangement may have suited in 1798, it is not practicable now.

The President, recognizing these several considerations, desired that the functions of the general board should be made permanent, under another name, by legislative enactment, and so expressed himself. "It is eminently desirable," he wrote to Congress in December, 1903, "that there should be provided (by Congress) a naval general staff." * * * "We need the establishment by law of a body of trained officers, who shall exercise a systematic control of the military affairs of the Navy and be authorized advisers of the Secretary concerning it."

This judicious recommendation of the President, ably seconded, as it was, by the Secretary of the Navy, met with violent opposition. And while it can not be said that the President's object was actually defeated by those upon whose support he had every moral and legal right to count, yet it may be affirmed that such opposition to constituted authority was not an example calculated to improve the morale of the naval service. The case is exceedingly valuable, however, as furnishing a good illustration of our peculiar methods of naval administration and the total absence from it of the military character—that very character the President saw was wanting.

* * * * * * *

Out of its own mouth shall the Department be judged. * * *

What is needed is legislative action based on a liberal and enlightened consideration of the whole subject of naval organization, from both the military and the civil point of view, to the end that the several parts may be evenly balanced and nicely adjusted, that our naval administration may become a model of efficiency and economy.

[From Proceedings of United States Naval Institute, March, 1905.]

THE TRUTH ABOUT NAVAL ADMINISTRATION.

[By Naval Constructor T. G. Roberts, United States Navy.]

In connection with this paper I wish to cite two ancient arguments and answer them in order, viz:

1. They say "that after consolidation the duties must again be subdivided among the various experts, which is the same practice as now; hence, nothing will be gained thereby." "That such a condition already exists in a commandant and his heads of departments, and you will only get back to where you started from."

This fallacy is simple, although it has been a puzzle for amateurs during many years past. It is a fact that personnel in any office must be assigned to duties in accordance with individual aptitude, and even subdivided to suit the class of work. Such is found in any business office anywhere. The flaw lies in the failure to perceive the difference between a single office and a single set of account books, executive orders, shops, and workmen, and a collective industrial establishment of six separate offices, each a power unto itself, duplicating each other and making work for each other. The difference in the application of expert services in the two cases is immaterial and cuts no figure in the governing considerations. The main thing is to have an expert head of the single industrial department who will bear the responsibility for the cost of the work. A commandant must exercise military control over the whole naval station, one unit of which should be the industrial department, the other units being the naval hospital, marine barracks, pay office, general storekeeper's storehouses, receiving ships, observatory, pharmacy, ships in ordinary, and ships in commission under repair, respectively. By this arrangement a commandant would have his hands full doing precisely the same things as now, and would have the same control as now, the only change being a consolidation of units under his control.

2. They say, "It is a good thing to have separate bureaus, since professional rivalry induces excellence in results."

That is an argument whose greatest vogue existed in the days of the anteamalgamation line-engineer wrangles. Professional disputes in navy-yard industry have never been recommended as a time and money saving device. No well-regulated establishment in civil life would permit for a moment a controversy-breeding state of affairs among its employees. That would be considered the first signal of collective inefficiency.

Finally, I wish it clearly understood that in this paper my criticisms do not apply to bureaus or departments or individuals as such; none of the above deserve criticism from me in this connection, it being evident that each must operate as best it can under the system in which it finds itself. The fault is in the system as a collective institution, and I hope, therefore, not to be misunderstood.

INTRODUCTORY.

There seems to be a spirit of dissatisfaction all over the country with the alleged shortcomings of our methods of naval administration, and at the present time the available testimony from all sources tends to give a confusion of ideas that is apt to lead us astray should we make a wrong diagnosis of the case.

Testimony of the highest and the lowest authorities has laid the cause at the door of the administrative system of navy-yards, which is conceded to be cumbersome, unwieldly, and expensive, due to the divided authority distributed among several heads of departments. The foregoing are established facts proved by the superabundance of evidence that has accumulated for many years past. The circumstantial evidence with which the Congressmen most interested have become impressed is found in the duplication and triplication and quadruplication of separate plants within a navy-yard, each department being, or endeavoring to be, complete in itself and independent of the others. No amount of conflicting testimony can prevent the inevitable conclusion which American men of intelligence must form in this epoch of business combinations. There is no doubt about the cause of the present state of affairs; the only problem is the remedy.

The foregoing conditions have been brought to the front entirely from considerations outside the service proper, but in the midst of this unsettled state of feeling comes a hue and cry from within the Navy by the advocates of a general staff, which they say is warranted to cure all the existing ills. It is claimed that a permanent body of line officers, in addition to those already on hand, should be established within the Navy Department for the purpose, primarily, of furnishing a "mere civilian Secretary" with hand-picked knowledge of strategy to direct the fleet and "wield the Navy as a weapon," and incidentally to coerce the multibureau system into uniform ideas and economical habits by the power of military rank and authority. I think that is the gist of it. The purpose seems to be to confine these operations to the mental and paper machinery inside the Navy Department at Washington. The motif of this campaign, with high rank and emoluments dangling around it, has been brought into question by the current literature on the subject.

The foregoing facts constitute the summary of the present conditions as they exist, and it shall be my purpose to analyze the situation from its various bearings, and to endeavor to find a remedy.

NAVAL ADMINISTRATION.

It is necessary to recognize, in the first place, that three separate and distinct methods of administration are found within the operations of the Navy Department, comprising what we understand as naval administration. These three divisions may be classified under the heads (1) political, (2) military, and (3) industrial.

The political system is represented by the head of the Navy Department, who is, and ever will be, a civilian, because the spirit and essence of our Government is based on a subjection of the military to the civil institution.

The political administration, as above classified, is frequently referred to as civil administration, which it is; but so also is industrial administration, and to avoid confusion, the foregoing classification will be adhered to throughout.

Military administration refers to that under the line officers, who alone are eligible to the supreme command of a ship, a squadron, or a fleet. Line officer means a naval officer in the line of promotion to such command. The functions are purely military, and the purely military field of operations finds its most correct example on board a ship or in a fleet. Shipboard administration will be considered the exact expression of military administration in the Navy. The strategy and directing power of a fleet are included in the same definition.

By industrial administration is meant that portion engaged in the production and manufacture of a ship and its accessories, which may be more closely defined as those departments engaged in procuring materials and operating civilian mechanics in producing the ship. Navy-yard administration is industrial in all that applies to workshop and civil employees as found to exist in the analogous institution of a private shipyard, being military only by virtue of the supreme authority vested in a commandant.

(1) POLITICAL ADMINISTRATION.

The Secretary of the Navy represents the political administrator. Politics is our method of securing government of the people, by the people, for the people. The politically successful man is one selected by the majority as their representative, because of personal attributes most acceptable to the people, whose actions the people believe will be most agreeable to themselves concerned. He is, presumably, the embodiment of our form of government, and to his authority the military and industrial considerations must bow.

The political feature finds its expression in various ways in naval administration, over and above all other considerations contemplated in the military establishment as laid down in the Navy regulations. If a ship must be overhauled and repaired and two navy-yards desire to get the work, the workmen's representatives that clamor loudest usually get it, that being the will of the majority that care anything about it. Within the service the opinion always holds that such matters, as all others, should be determined by the absolute merits of the case, regardless of clamors. The military administrator must determine his actions by merit, that being the root and foundation of his education and training, and he cares little about the will of the people where his position is not influenced by such a regard. A naval officer is not in the best position to be a political administrator—he can read from the mercurial barometer an approach of a storm at sea, but he is handicapped where it comes to feeling the pulse of the people from the touch of the political barometer.

Political administration finds its way into the service in shifting ships and work from one station to another, in shifting personnel in like manner, in the location of navy-yards and naval stations, in appropriations for new buildings and new expenditures of all kinds at the various stations; it determines whether vessels shall be built or repaired at navy-yards. In time of war political considerations divert naval vessels from the fleet to patrol the coasts in the vicinity of frightened political communities. It has given high position to political favorites and has determined the command of ships and squadrons. Sometimes it goes even further and influences the actions of naval boards in their duties under the regulations. Boards have been known to have their recommendations returned for revision until they meet the political desires, or another board may be called to reverse their actions, and so on until the desired results are attained. This operates to promote personnel in some cases, or discharge or retire it in others. It operates sometimes to increase the pay of the navy-yard mechanic. Its existence has been alleged in political contests against nonpartisan shipbuilders in the trials of vessels, and it shows itself in various forms in the distribution of contracts for new ships, and is constantly at work in the purchase and acceptance of all sorts of materials for Government use. The head of a Government Department is sensitive to the representations of the people; if he is not, some one soon takes his place who is. Of course there have been abuses, as in every other department of life, but a good administrator knows enough not to try to reform the people or the political system of which he is a part; he does his part best if he recognizes facts as they exist; and he concedes to political demands, if they are logical, where it makes no material difference otherwise, and where it does not interfere with the object for which his institution was created.

I am not attempting to lay down rules, but merely to place an estimate on what appears to have been the guiding features of political administration from the evidences that have come to notice in the past.

Is such a political government an abuse? Should the people rule the people? If the public's wishes be disregarded, the Government becomes autocratic by definition, and how else can their wishes be made known except through their representatives? If reform, who will attempt it, and how? Would the creation of a general staff, or any other sort of a mechanism inside the Navy Department destroy, limit, or influence in any way the politics of the head of the Department as it applies to the military and industrial establishments? It may as well be conceded, in the light of history, that the political administration, whatever its good or evil, will remain untrammeled as long as our form of government exists.

(2) MILITARY ADMINISTRATION.

Only on board a naval vessel does military discipline hold complete sway. The order of the captain is the law and must be obeyed without question, argument, or appeal to a higher power. The captain must confine his actions to the limits prescribed by law, but inside those limits he can cover almost any sort of overbearing conduct toward those beneath him, officers and men alike. He can not strike them, or punish them physically beyond the lawful limit; but he can harangue them and institute such a personal bearing toward them as to punish them mentally beyond degree. There is no appeal from an order, which must be obeyed with alacrity whether right or wrong, and he who refuses classifies his actions with the mutineers, the limit of which, in grave cases, is death. He who answers back goes to prison, but he can not resign or be discharged. I am merely specifying the limits in order to distinguish more clearly between military and industrial administration and to show that a trained military administrator is as different from an industrial as from a political administrator.

Our bureau system is represented in miniature on the ship. The captain represents the Bureau of Navigation, which directs his own actions and the movements of the ship. Although the other bureaus are represented, not one of them has any right or power of appeal that would modify in the least the perfect and absolute control of the directing administrative bureau and its captain in the wielding of the ship as a fighting machine. In this point it differs from navy-yard administration, as we shall see presently. The executive officer represents the Bureau of Construction and Repair, and the ordnance, equipment, medical, pay, and marine officers represent the corresponding bureaus. In the operation of the bureau system in the use of tools, stores, etc., there are no conflictions; they are used where needed indiscriminately by shipboard authority or without. If one bureau's machine breaks down another bureau's force repairs it, if more handy. The bureau representatives themselves are not expert in the lines of demarcation and cognizance of the bureaus, a line officer representing a staff bureau, and there is no provision for appeal beyond the ship if one should so desire. In other words, the captain has complete control of the ship and all her accessories, and the bureau system divides the duties of officers into a convenient distribution of the work. Military efficiency is attained by drilling, innate intelligence, alacrity in obedience to orders, and the good example and rigid discipline that must be maintained by the officers at all hazards. Admiral Farragut laid down a military rule for all time when he said to his officers: "Whatever is to be done must be done quickly." Shipboard efficiency consists in preparedness and alacrity. It has little to do with dollars and cents. Military economy is exercised in taking care of the materials and avoiding waste, in about the same way as one would take care of a new suit of clothes, or would eat sparingly of his provisions during a long journey. It has nothing to do with saving money by a judicial distribution of the laboring forces, to obtain the best returns for the money expended, which forms the essence of industrial administration.

On the contrary, shipboard administration contemplates expending the maximum amount of labor in order to fill up the time. Those who have been to sea know the monotony of having nothing to do, which tends to generate the spirit of unhappiness. Hence, the sailor's proverb that the best commander keeps his crew happy by keeping them busy. Happiness is healthy for the mind, labor is healthy for the body, and these essentials permit of the attainment of military preparedness, alertness, and efficiency. Industrial economy is a different profession. It is a law of humanity that a man is most proficient in the line of his ambitions. The highest ambition of a line officer is to command at sea. In that position the eyes of the whole world may be turned on him in war, and his name may be in every mouth. He may bring honor or disgrace to his country. He must be a specialist in the strictest sense, but not a general practitioner. Besides familiarity with the methods of wielding the men and the tools at his disposal, he must be familiar with strategy, international law, naval history, navigation, and tactics. None can afford to be an indifferent expert in these branches, for a single blunder in one might lose all. No profession in civil life forms any sort of analogy or comparison to that of a line officer, and it is a matter of current belief that the easy habits and disciplinary notions of naval training unfit an officer for civil pursuits; and it is likewise apparent that civilians never have been, and can not be, eligible to the position of a line officer without the necessary course of training. It requires no analytical mind to discern the irreconcilable differences between industrial and military administration.

(3) INDUSTRIAL ADMINISTRATION.

The peaceful arts of the shipbuilding mechanics comprise the industrial features of naval administration, as is represented by a navy-yard. The business of such an institution is to manufacture, repair, or assemble the vessel and her outfit. The production of the vessel belongs purely to civil industry, being the product of the shipbuilding trades under the cognizance of labor unions. The pay of a sailor is merely nominal in comparison with that of the mechanical tradesman, which furnishes an opening for a considerable loss of funds unless the quality of administration secures the best combination in outlay of plant, in the purchase and handling of materials, and most important of all in the distribution and handling of the difficult and very expensive labor that fills up the navy-yards. The workmen may not be tongue lashed, nor put in the brig, but they may be discharged if the administrator has a good case.

Now, let us examine the operations of the bureau system as it applies to the industry of a navy-yard. The local representatives of bureaus comprise the corresponding departments of Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, Equipment, Yards and Docks, Ordnance, Supplies and Accounts, and Medicine and Surgery. The Bureau of Navigation is represented by the commandant.

The division of work assigned to each bureau or department is a development of the natural and convenient divisions that existed in shipbuilding when the bureaus were first formed in 1842. The original Bureau of Construction, Equipment, and Repair controlled practically all the industry that was required to build a ship. It included all that is now represented by the three bureaus Construction and Repair, Equipment, and Steam Engineering, the latter subdivisions having been made in 1862 during the stress of war. Had the Construction Bureau not been thus subdivided there would be a different tale to tell about the cost of navy-yard administration to-day. But no one could have foreseen the effect at that date. The subdivisions were natural ones, inasmuch as the Chief Constructor before that time had an engineer as assistant to look after the steam machinery of the new motive power.

The wood-ship builder viewed with suspicion the advent of steam, and the motive power of the future passed out of his hands to those who were willing to master it. A ship was then a simple affair, and there was no question as to where the propelling machinery left off and where the ship began. The Equipment Bureau undertook to relieve the Construction Bureau of assembling movable articles not strictly a part of a ship, but corresponding more nearly to the furnishings, such as sails, rigging, anchors and chains, the electrical outfit, and the like. With the changes that have come about in modern shipbuilding, the steel ships of to-day, with their complex machinery, have merged all professions into one. The wood-ship builder, as represented in the modern shipwright, has been driven almost out of business. His cognizance included the whole vessel in 1842, while now he is limited to the decks and the outside sheathing, if any. The steam engineer finds himself replacing his own auxiliary machinery with equipment motors, and he has to tolerate rival steam engines that form essential portions of the equipment and construction machinery. Likewise the Equipment Bureau finds rivals with electrical machinery in the Bureaus of Steam Engineering and Construction.

The original natural divisions of these three bureaus have become unnatural and very complex and illogical. All three operate both steam and electrical machinery, and generally throughout are trying to do similar work that now falls under one profession. I shall not endeavor to relate all the unreasonable subdivisions of the work in these bureaus, but will cite only a few samples. As new methods have been adopted, each bureau has claimed as much of the work as possible, and each head of department, disagreeing, has written out his case, and all the papers have gone to the Secretary of the Navy for decision. In the meantime, in many instances the work has waited several months until the matter was settled. The decisions have not followed any rule, but the bureau in most favor at the time has generally won. If the question was referred to a board composed mostly of line officers, the decision was given very frequently to the line officer contestant, if there was the slightest possible justification for it. I would remark here that with a general staff of pure line officers to pass on such questions, the bulk of industrial administration would pass from the staff bureaus into the hands of the military administrators, in case human nature should not unexpectedly reform. To-day the department of Steam Engineering owns the steam pipes of Construction pipes and engines, the deck hatches and gratings and their fastenings leading to the boiler and engine rooms, and also that portion of the hull drainage pipes that drain these compartments; Equipment owns the dynamos, and the dynamo foundations if there are any, and the railing around them if attached to these foundations. Shall I go any further? Suffice it to say, that the lines of cognizance between these bureaus are more mixed up than the present Navy pay table. The fault is not in the bureau method, but in the fact that the bureau system has not been readjusted to suit the natural divisions of shipbuilding as they exist since the steel ship has created a revolution in shipbuilding methods.

Shipbuilding was originally made up of several professions, but to-day it has merged into a single profession, and it not only includes the production of the whole ship, but it operates the shipbuilding plant, by which it controls the profit which forms the measure of efficiency in industrial administration. The remedy is the simplest business proposition in the country—consolidation. There is no economy in shifting cognizance from one bureau to another, as now organized; each department has developed according to its needs, by virtue of experience, and to shift its power, plant, or shop to some other department only acts to deprive the one that needs it and prevents the responsible party from controlling its own profits. There is a great deal of talk about consolidating the power plants of a navy-yard. The idea seems to be that only the power plants are duplicated. That is a very great error. Everything is duplicated and multiplied. In the navy-yard with which the writer has been associated for the past five years there are in the several departments the following shops, viz:

Six power plants, eight machine shops, five joiner shops, five paint shops, five laborers' lobbies, four blacksmith shops, four pattern shops, four tin shops, four fuel-oil plants, four testing laboratories, three electrical workshops, three copper shops, three riggers' gangs, three polishing shops, three fuel-gas plants, three foundries, two steel-plate shops, two electroplating shops, thirty-two storehouses under separate roofs, fifty material fields, or piles of materials not under cover, and thirteen coal sheds and bins under separate roofs.

Some of the foregoing shops exist only in miniature, being parts of other shops, but are separate organizations doing similar work. A more exact idea of the extent of these repetitions may be gathered from the following:

Power plants: Construction and Repair owns two, one main and one auxiliary; Steam Engineering owns one; Yards and Docks owns two, one main and one docking plant (in the same building with the Construction and Repair plant); and Equipment owns one.

Machine shops: Construction and Repair has two main and one emergency (and two floating, not counted above); Steam Engineering has one main and one emergency; Equipment has one, and Ordnance has one.

Foundries: Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, and Equipment have one each.

Smitheries: Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, Yards and Docks, and Equipment have one each.

Joiner shops: The five departments have one each.

Pattern shops: The four departments, excluding Ordnance, have one each. Two of these have not separate shops, but do their pattern making in their joiner shops.

Tin shops: The four departments, excluding Ordnance, have one each, some doing tin work with tinsmith machinery as parts of other shops.

Paint shops: The five departments have one each, two of them employing one, two, or more men, sufficient to do their own painting.

Copper shops: Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, and Ordnance have one each.

Steel-plate shops: Construction and Repair and Yards and Docks have one each for working plates and shapes.

Electrical workshops: Construction and Repair, Yards and Docks, and Equipment have one each.

Laborers' lobbies: The five departments each employ their own laborers' gangs and implements.

Fuel-oil plants: Construction and Repair has two, and Steam Engineering and Yards and Docks, one each. Two of these are small units.

Gas plants: Construction and Repair has one, and Equipment and Supplies and Accounts (testing laboratory) have a small unit each.

Testing laboratories: Construction and Repair, Yards and Docks, Steam Engineering, and Supplies and Accounts have one each.

Polishing shops: Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, and Equipment have one each.

Electroplating shops: Construction and Repair and Equipment have one each.

Riggers' gangs: Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, and Equipment each employs its own gang of riggers.

The thirty-two storehouses comprise buildings and shops containing stores of any kind, whether in the possession of the general storekeeper, or of the department having cognizance of them.

The fifty material piles include every sort of material of value in separate lots, or different varieties, as distributed near the storehouses or shops where it is most likely to be used.

It may be noted that in each case of shop duplication above the Construction and Repair Department has one, that being usually the largest one.

Now add to these the corresponding sets of foremen, clerks, and draftsmen in each department, and you have seventy-five foremen, eighty clerks, and thirty-six draftsmen. By foremen is meant master mechanics, quartermen, and leading men combined—i. e., men who superintend work. There are thirteen foremen machinists, of whom four are master machinists. Of the seventy-five foremen, forty occupy positions in charge of their respective gangs. Of the eighty clerks, thirty-three belong to the general storehouses. By clerks I mean all those who would be so termed in civil life.

In one department there is a leading man pattern maker in charge of four men; in another it requires a master pattern maker and a leading man for seven men. In one there is a quarterman molder for fifteen men; in another a master molder for eighteen men, etc.

There is no necessity for more than one shop of each class and kind, as proved by the private shipyard, and no private shipyard could afford to have so many directing officials.

The shops and forces of the departments being duplicated, it follows that the heads of departments, and hence the departments themselves, are pretty nearly duplicated, which is, actually, from a shipbuilder's point of view, a fact. Nothing short of industrial consolidation will be worth while, and the establishment should not only be consolidated, but it should be divorced from the military, so to speak; that is to say, the one shipbuilding department should be a unit under the one shipbuilding head, responsible for the economy of the work. Our navy-yards would then be as in France. We are moving toward the French methods. We tried the British Admiralty Board from 1779 to 1781, but abolished it. It was tried again from 1815 to 1842 in the form of the Navy Commissioners, but it was again abolished as being unsuitable. Every young nation tries the British Admiralty method. It suits England for reasons purely English. The posts of honor and command are kept in the aristocracy for the benefit of the younger sons of the nobility. The line of the British navy is sought by them as a profession. The "Board of Commissioners for the Execution of the Office of Lord High Admiral of His Britannic Majesty's Navy," belongs to a privileged class. In this country we expect a man to be responsible only for what he knows; our lords of industry are the engineering nobility who have won their titles by actual achievement in their own particular line.

We have left the British Admiralty method far behind long ago and are approaching the French system. We hear of a general staff—that is what we sometimes erroneously translate the French état-major to mean. We hear that we need a "bureau of personnel" and a "bureau of matériel." That is all French in name and method, and all our own bureaus are adopted and named after the French. Then let us have the French "bureau of matériel" precisely as it exists, which consolidates all industrial shops and works under the one head of "naval construction;" its directing "personnel" is composed of "Ingenieurs des constructions navales." It includes also all ordnance workshops and fittings in navy-yards. Unlike our ordnance, theirs is manufactured by civil industry and shipped to navy-yards, where it is handled and installed by the department of naval constructions. French navy-yard industry is confined to the one department, which combines every shop and tradesman under a single head, and that not a military head, nor a number of mixed military and industrial heads, but rather an industrial head who is competent to take the responsibility for the things he knows, the things of his special education and training, the things of his pride and ambition, the only things by virtue of which eminent ability may permit him to rise to any sort of distinction. Not that he needs distinction and should be allowed to attain it, but that the human composition is such that the best efficiency can not be attained by any other inducements in a system where hope of reward must be the stimulus; where neither capital, salary, nor interest, from a personal investment, are at stake. "Individual responsibility reposing in the head who instructed in the things he is responsible for is at the root of efficiency." Our bureau method is preeminently such a method, and is the most perfect yet devised, but has become uneconomical for the plain reason that the system of the bureaus has not been readjusted to suit the natural subdivisions of the present times, until the supposedly "sharply defined duties and responsibilities of overspecialized bureaus," to adopt Captain Mahan's diction, have become interlaced, interwoven, and intertangled to such an extent as to exist only in theory and imagination, but have no semblance in reality.

The Bureaus of Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, Equipment, and Yards and Docks should be combined under the heading of Bureau of Naval Construction; the Bureaus of Ordnance, Supplies and Accounts, and Medicine and Surgery to remain practically as at present; excepting that, as in France, the Bureau of Naval Construction should have cognizance of its own materials so as to control the economy in their purchase and handling.

The Bureau of Ordnance should remain as now, excepting that its duties should end with the manufacture and shipment of ordnance and armor; its plans should be limited to these items and should not include any portion of the vessel to which they are applied. This is in order to unify the manufacture of plans at the Navy Department and the plans and building work at shipyards as the nearest approximate measure of economy. Strictly speaking, ordnance and armor belong to the broad Division of Material, along with the rest of the ship, by definition, and by the example of the Navy furnishing us with the term, and hence, logically, should be combined with the other bureaus of material. In that event it would become advisable to detail line officers as inspectors, since in this country, unlike some other countries, naval ordnance has been developed and manufactured almost purely by line officers, and it would not be advantageous to take it out of their hands. This renders it less advisable to include the Bureau of Ordnance in the consolidation; but since the ordnance and armor factories are not situated so as to duplicate work of any kind, a result almost equal to consolidation will be obtained by consolidating the design and building of ship and machinery, exclusive only of ordnance and armor, under the single industrial bureau. This arrangement need not exclude the inspector of ordnance when guns are being installed on shipboard, but should require his presence, as in France.

There is sufficient evidence to believe that the Bureau of Navigation has grown too large and that it should be separated into two bureaus, the new one to be called the "Bureau of Personnel." This bureau should take over the items suggested by its name, and other kindred duties that will leave only the items concerning strategy to the Bureau of Navigation. The latter bureau would retain, of course, the Intelligence Office, the War College, the direction of the fleet, war plans, and all those functions which go to make up the sum total of "the wielding of the Navy as a weapon;" and besides would inherit, from the defunct bureaus, the Naval Observatory, coaling stations, other naval stations, and in fact everything else except navy-yards, stations, and docks engaged in the building or repair of vessels. I merely suggest, not advise, the latter subdivision. It can not, in any wise, affect industrial administration.

The present necessity is the unification of navy-yard industry, so that it can not duplicate itself, and so that naval industrial administration may operate in the full benefit of modern methods as developed with such eminent success in the private industries of this country. All power plants, shops, heads of departments, assistants, draftsmen, clerks, foremen, leading men, and mechanics may be combined into one set of each class or kind. The result would effect a reduction of the number of buildings in use, the working forces, and the total cost of the establishment by an amount that would be startling to predict. The military authority should remain supreme in a commandant, but the industrial establishment, being in subjection to the military, need not be subdivided into a number of mixed administrations interwoven as now, but combined and divorced as a pure industrial unit.

EVILS TO BE CURED.

Of the present evils of greatest moment is the unsystematic method of laying out new yard plants and the distribution of shop buildings among the various departments. The sites for the plants themselves are selected, usually, by people having an eye only to the depth of water, facilities for military protection, and the nature of the soil. The most important economic industrial consideration contained in the contour of the site and water frontage and in the economic arrangement of shops have seemingly had no part whatever in the establishment of our navy-yard plants.

Economy in arrangement, whereby labor and material travel by the shortest route between shop and ship, is an asset which means a goodly percentage in profit as long as the plant endures. A steel plate that will travel 300 yards from plate rack to its place on the ship's side in a poorly arranged plant may travel only a hundred yards in its course from machine to machine in a well-arranged plant. The reduction in cost of handling is very appreciable; and if this be applied to all the multitude of articles that go to complete a modern ship, the difference in cost is considerable. The same condition obtains with labor, which is more important, because more expensive. The shipfitting and joiner shops belong nearest the building slips and fitting-out berths, so that the class of men that fit and refit from shop to ship will have to walk the shortest distance; for the similar reason that the engine and boiler shops would be at the rear, as near the fitting-out berths as possible, since the engines and boilers may be built complete in the shops, and when ready may be hauled any distance by rail to the fitting-out berths. Every shop has a logical location in a shipyard, yet no shop can have its proper place by our methods. Each department seeks the main business street as centrally located as possible. Sites and shops are let in a haphazard way, and even if determined by a board the most influential member gets the most central location. In the navy-yard of my most intimate acquaintance the distance of the farthest buildings from the power house of one department is so great that the cost of the electric-power wires is something extraordinary; one department is widely separated into two large halves by another department lying between, and the joiner shop is farthest away from slips and berths, while the engine and boiler shops are nearest the slips and docks, just the reverse of where they ought to be. Yet the losses on first cost and circuitousness must appear in the figures of cost as long as the plant exists.

Another great source of loss lies in the lack of harmony that usually exists between the heads of departments. There are two sorts of interdepartment administration; one where controversy is rife, another where obliging tact prevails. It may be observed here, incidentally, that the one who willfully enters into a squabble is a downright enemy to economy, for when at their best, heads of departments are far enough apart by the very nature of things. One department finishes its work to where another begins, and then endeavors to get the other department to supply the connecting link. The second department may have its men on a more pressing job, or may not even have obtained funds for the work in hand. The delay in connecting may be anywhere from an hour to a month. Worse than that has happened. These misconnections are very frequent, due to the simple fact that the various heads of departments have different trains of thought, and one can not divine what the other intends to do until the time arrives. The great effort of working ahead of time in all the mass of details is not to be expected from men whose capital or income does not bind them to it, and whose salary depends on the limits of the single duties of their own department as laid down in the Navy Regulations. Unintentional misconnections between departments are the source of the greatest loss of time and money in the operation of the plants as they now stand. One department owns a crane, a second department is using it, while a third department waits for it. The time of making connections, getting permission, and waiting may keep a whole gang of men out of work for some time. One department builds a shop, the second department buys an elevator for it; the original plans made to fit are changed by one department without the knowledge of the other, and the elevator is found not to suit the shaft, so the floor just completed must be cut out again.

A load of steel plates arrives and must be immediately removed by one department from the receiving station. This causes one handling. Another department has the list of plates, what they are and who they are for, and retains it sometimes a week or two. When the list arrives the third department has to inspect them, one by one, to examine the inspector's mark on each. The first department does not find it convenient to handle them until the broken crane of the fourth department is mended, to avoid rehandling them twice again. At the end of some months the inspection is completed and the contractor has lost several months' interest on his money.

One department buys a lot of materials that it thinks the other department will need, and owing to a miscalculation of the other department's habits the goods lie in store for an indefinite time. Two departments disagree on a matter touching both. The first one begins the work and the other writes a letter to the commandant, who refers it to the first one for his arguments. If the work is important the commandant authorizes the one he thinks is right, and forwards the papers to the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for a decision to guide in future cases. If unimportant, the work may await the decision. Sometimes friction arises between two departments; they begin to make caustic remarks and indorsements to each other. The clerks, foremen, and workmen soon catch it, and there is a regular blockade of the interlying work between the two. When this happens, lords of old in feudal castles were not in more impregnable fortresses than are the two belligerent heads. The warfare is waged silently by mutual understanding; each puts the other out as much as possible, and there is no power on earth to stop them except by mutual consent. The commandant seldom has evidence of its existence. If anything comes up in correspondence he settles the point at issue; if one reports the other, verbally or by letter, the other always has a plausible reason to offer. It is simply impossible for one to make the other come to time, and reports are liable to cut both ways, like a two-edged sword, and are out of fashion.

A dry dock belongs to one department, also its operating power plant. The operation of it belongs to the second department, and if the engines and boilers become old, dilapidated, and uneconomical, needing to be repaired or replaced, the first department must obtain the appropriations and make the repairs, if it approves the changes; its uninterested opinion governs, and in the meantime the second department bears on its books the unwilling losses from uneconomical operation, sometimes for a period of years.

The most unnatural scope of bureau cognizance is exemplified in the modern floating dry dock which falls under the bureau bearing a similar name, due undoubtedly to the circumstance of a name inherited from the graving dock. The design and building of a floating dock belongs purely to naval architecture (and not to civil engineering); yet the Government fails to utilize its own naval architects in such work, but pays the premiums, going to the naval architects of civil industry.

Another misfit is found in the building of a new shop by one department for another. The second department begins simultaneously to procure appropriations for the machinery. First there is a duplication of drafting work. The building plans originate in the second department, defining the internal arrangement within its cognizance. These plans are remade with changes by the first department. The one department's machinery requisition goes through without a hitch, while the other department's building may be held up for months after the machinery is delivered. The building may go a winter or two without heating or some other necessary facilities, while the other department's force must endure it. The building foundations may have been laid before the necessity of driving piles to support the other department's machinery becomes discovered, and when the piles are then driven the foundations are ruptured and require extensive repairs. On no kind of work is misconnection so rife, so radical, or so damaging as between the department that supplies the building, and the one that supplies the machinery and uses it. The building just completed must be multilated with holes, underground wiring conduits, brackets, and machinery foundations to suit the need of No. 2, which No. 1 could not foresee to assemble himself or to have assembled in time to make all connections; and the worst of it is No. 1 lets the contract to a civilian contractor, No. 3. If the middleman, No. 1, built the house himself, there would be some logical excuse for his separate existence, but navy-yard shops and houses are built by private contract, as in other countries.

A contractor delivers a load of coal for department No. 1. A sample is inspected and passed by body No. 2. An order comes from department No. 3 forbidding the schooner to unload until a ship is moved from the vicinity. Department No. 4, owning the crane, must be consulted to have the crane heads sent at the proper time. Interdepartment correspondence ensues, until finally, after about four days, the schooner comes alongside and is unloaded with the ship, crane, and everything else standing in the same positions as when she first arrived. The loss to the contractor is four days' demurrage on the schooner, and he could not get damages from the Government if he tried, and the Government could not fix the responsibility if it tried.

One department confers with another by letter and gets a reply in a day or two; mails are sometimes delivered quicker in a city. Letters from business firms come to one department and are referred to the others, one at a time, for indorsement. In four to ten days the circuit is made and the original letter sometimes goes back to the business house plastered with six to ten indorsements in reply to its query. The amount of paper work is out of all proportion. The cost accounts of a manufacturing department are duplicated in the accounting department. The accounts of work done by one department for another are duplicated in both departments. Copies of contracts for one department made by the purchasing department are duplicated in both, together with many contingent inspection and other papers. A head of department executes a multiplicity of orders and then becomes a paper defendant to justify his actions brought into question always after the work is done. The amount of paper work inherent in the system leaves only too little time for carrying out the real work.

There is also the commercial-representative evil. Some commercial houses have representatives who visit navy-yards as constantly as any of their other customers. They convince foremen, leading men, clerks, chemists, officers, and their assistants of the quality of their goods, and offer specifications, suggestions, and objections. Any of the latter, in some way or other at some time, or both, may be able to influence the kind or quality of the goods bought. The evil and dangers are apparent. Business houses claim and they have a right to discuss business with the Government and to have representations at the rejection of goods. A single department would render practicable the concentration of all business inquiries in a single office and officer.

A board of inspection also complicates the situation. There are three members, two of whom seldom see the goods they sign away, but only delay the paper work in triplicate. The member representing the department for whom the goods are bought is the de facto inspection board, and is so known to contractors and Government alike. The presence of a board and all its paper machinery does not even conceal the fact, and the one member bears all the responsibility. There are six separate offices in which inspection papers and correspondence are eligible for consideration or indorsement, viz, general storekeeper, commandant, head of department concerned, inspection board, chemist, and the representative member. The shortest possible trip is via four of these, the return trip being the same. The time of a single trip depends on the uncertainties of messenger service, but is usually a day to a week, unless by urgent necessity a simple paper is escorted throughout the trip by a single messenger, which even then is long unless all heads happen to be in.

There is a shift of head of department and representative member for every department's inspections, which leads us into the problem of premutations and combinations to figure out what may happen to inspection matters that touch all departments, or more than one, at the same time, as naval supply fund materials, for instance.

The head of department most concerned has the final "say" in practice, and all departments being combined into one would place inspections under his direction and responsibility the same as the rest of the work. That would abridge all papers and place the work and the final "say" where they actually rest now. If there ever was an anomalous paper institution, it exists in an inspection board.

Another superfluity is the paint board, which loses time in the preparation of a lot of useless papers. Combination would replace it by a simple letter from the head of the department.

Each department is not complete in itself, but may require another department to do work it can not perform. One having no foundry may make requisition for the one with foundry to make its castings. The first department must furnish the materials, while the other department does the work and transfers back the charges so the labor may be paid from the appropriations of the department having cognizance of the work. Thus the cost appears against the first department, whereas it really had no hand in controlling the amount, which may be exorbitant. This occurs constantly, and it is evident the total expense account of a department includes a portion made outside of its control and for whose excess it can not be responsible. Another feature is illustrated in the effect of shifting cognizance from one department to another. Once the Government decided to economize by centralizing the lighting plants into a single department. The result was the department that needed light on ship work was supplied with inadequate lights, the ancient practice of using candles grew to an unnecessary extent, and hundreds of men have stood many hours in the dark, glad at the opportunity for a rest. The authority shifting the lighting from the department that controlled its cost and operation for its own work could not have understood how its details were going to work out. With all power plants shifted and consolidated under one department as the bureaus are now adjusted, the operation and cost of power would be beyond the control of the department using it, but the cost would be charged against that department, which would be held responsible for it notwithstanding, since this cost must have been included in the estimates and appears on the books against it. Such reform as that is truly "straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel."

Another illustration of interdepartmental methods may be shown by the following example: An appropriation is made to build a ship and is apportioned at Washington between the three bureaus producing the hull, machinery, and equipment. The department building the hull must be responsible for its cost. Incidentally, the building slip and launching ways must be prepared. A fourth department, having no allotment, must drive the piles by virtue of its cognizance as determined in the Navy regulations. The hull department must require the piles to be driven by the fourth department, and the latter determines all features included in the cost. The pile-driving department answers to nobody for expense, being the supreme judge of all matters touching its technical duties, while the cost is transferred back to the hull department, who must answer for it, though having no command over it. This requires the hull department to detail an inspector to watch the pile department to determine whether the men charged to the work have actually been present and properly engaged on the work as paid for. No regular inspectors having been provided for such work, this inspection is delegated to someone who is most handy; but only on large work of importance can inspection be employed, for there is so much small work going on of a similar character that it is impossible to anticipate it or to check it up after it is done; for in some cases where such charges have been transferred it has been found that men so charged for a whole day may have been engaged on the work only an hour, or perhaps a few of them may only have handled some of the material in the shops or may have done nothing at all on the work. This result may be quite unintentional and due to the methods of preparing accounts; but I shall not descend into those minutiæ. A day never passes but what every department transfers accounts of work done for the other departments, and they are of such varied and irregular character that practically no one can be held responsible for their correctness, much less for the economy exercised in producing them. The same is true of work within the cognizance of one department which has not the shops to do it with and must request another department to do it, with the same transferring of accounts and uncertainty of costs.

Is this evidence enough, or shall other instances be cited? How should it be remedied?

Shall the commandant be vested with authority to violate the Navy regulations defining bureau cognizance, or shall he be permitted to violate the appropriation act and charge the work to the most convenient appropriations, to avoid the paper and other evils? If so, will someone venture to explain in what features will navy-yard administration be benefited thereby?

If not that, then how will a General Staff, composed of military administrators, line officers only, interposed between the present bureaus and the Secretary of the Navy, ameliorate the situation?

There is no possible solution other than consolidation.

At the moment of this writing, out of a yard force of 1,426 workmen at the yard I have in mind, 761 of them belong to the construction and repair department and 665 to all other departments combined. At all navy-yards in full operation the construction and repair department force is usually greater than all the other combined, and always has been. The reason is because navy-yards exist principally for the construction and repair of ships. To consolidate the whole is not far to go.

Consolidation would cure also the spasmodic economy evil: One department has no money to do absolutely necessary work, while another department can not find enough work to expend all its funds; one can obtain all the material it needs, another has to take what it can get; one can supply motors for all its power on shipboard, another can not afford generators to give the crew electric lights; one can supply mahogany furniture for every need, another can not replace an article of furniture that falls to pieces from old age; one is worked to the limit of mental and bodily strain to reduce the costs, another rocks along easily, waiting for the quitting bell to ring. One wastes what the other saves.

One of the most expensive luxuries indulged in by the Government is a haphazard administrator—a merely accomplished officer, whose only necessity is to know enough to keep out of trouble, and perhaps, after some experience, to accumulate enough data to engage in a controversy. He is putty in the hands of his foremen. A ship arrives to be overhauled. The foremen make his estimates for him, and in so doing they determine the limits of the estimates. Shall this work be repaired or renewed? The foreman says it must be made new, with suitable gestures. The foreman's judgment usually governs the totals of the estimates. One who is not in a position to know better than his foremen must retreat when the latter present arguments which he knows not how to refute. Likewise the foremen determine the actual limits of the work undertaken, which may overrun the estimates. Foremen are from among the workmen, who are their friends and companions, and it is but natural to look out for new work and hold fast to that in hand. Otherwise it means discharges for the tradesmen, which is not a popular idea among them. Usually when an old ship gets safely moored alongside a navy-yard for a general overhauling she may bid farewell to the world until there is other work in sight.

One must know more than his foremen and have the will power of his convictions in order to be able to limit the work to its proper amount and cost, and he must be very energetic and diplomatic in exemplifying his superiority by a vigorous line of action. When several hundred expensive mechanics are engaged on a single ship, at a cost of several hundred dollars a day, more money can be sunk in shorter time than in any other way at a navy-yard, especially if the workmen are holding on to the job like grim death, with no other work in sight, with a figurehead in charge of the department. If the electric lights go out and the men stand idle for an hour, that is of little consequence where the work of repairs may be drawn out for several months without half trying.

Recently the captain of a ship forwarded to Washington a letter accompanied by a sample copy of each of the different bureaus' blank forms for survey, his contention being that all these forms should be reduced to a single one, applying to all bureaus alike. The stores belonging to one bureau must be included on a separate form supplied by that bureau, and the bureaus' forms differ on account of the differences of the methods and usages of the bureaus themselves. The consolidation of the bureaus handling material would reduce these forms to unity, and thus ameliorate a number of kindred inconveniences.

Another evil which combination would cure is to be found in the prevention of improvements to shipboard machinery where such improvement would transfer its cognizance to another bureau. Thus, steam auxiliaries have refused, at times, for such a reason to give way to motors, long after the auxiliary steam engine stands discredited everywhere else. The limit of bureau cognizance influences and injures the design of a ship in various details, and stands in the way of many improvements.

Likewise, no one may encompass, and be responsible for, the design of a ship as a whole. The art of shipbuilding is amply provided for in point of quality of workmanship, for where a poor job of work occurs the person who did it can always be definitely located; but the science of shipbuilding has no connecting link provided to unit the interdependent functions governing the mobility of a ship. The speed, vibrations, coal consumption, radius of action, economy of power, water consumption, and horsepower of a ship depend upon three separate and interrelated things, viz, the model, the propeller, and the engines. On the model depend the speed, vibrations, wake coefficient, bow and stern waves, and horsepower. The functions of the propeller influence and depend upon the model, wake coefficient, speed, revolutions, slip, vibrations, depth of water, coal and water consumption, radius of action, indicated horsepower, and economy of operation. On the engines depend the speed, vibrations, horsepower, coal and water consumption, revolutions, radius of action, and economy of operation. The bureau that designs the hull has no "say" with respect to the propeller and engines, and the bureau that designs the latter has no say about the hull; so that no competent person is provided for, or permitted, by the Government to design these three component parts, or to adjust them to secure the best results, or to locate the errors in the completed vessel.

If a new ship fails to attain the desired speed, it may be due to the insufficient horsepower or inefficient propeller of one bureau, or to the lines of hull, foul bottom, displacement, trim, or lack of depth of water at trial of another bureau's consideration. If there are excessive vibrations it may be due to an unbalanced engine, an improperly designed propeller, or a wrong location of the engines with respect to the hull's nodes of vibration of one bureau's cognizance. If the vessel is uneconomical and has a large coal and water consumption and a small radius of action, it may be due to a foul bottom, wrong propeller, excessive steam consumption of engines, or inefficient boilers. There is no one in a position to locate the fault and denote whether it belong to one bureau or the other, nor is anyone in a position to profit by the experience and correct future designs. There is greater reason to combine the design of the whole ship under one head than to combine the two departments building it. A ship is too small to separate its design or its building under any but one head. It may have been necessary forty-two years ago when the shipwright knew nothing of steam or electricity and the separate professions had to be employed to obtain the whole, but at this epoch when a war ship has merged into a machinery plant where hull, engines, boilers, dynamos, and all the other fittings are formed into shape by the same or similar machinery from iron, steel, brass, and copper by the same class of mechanics, there no longer remains an excuse for unnatural subdivisions descended from the olden times. The whole field of the shipbuilding profession today is not more than a specialized branch of mechanical engineering—steam engines, boilers, electricity, and naval architecture. Not even so diversified as the mechanical engineering of commerce, which encompasses the broad field covered by the great variety and differences in machinery, plants, and methods employed in the private industries of the country, but merely the comparatively narrow field of mechanical engineering applying to a shipyard plant only, and the architecture of naval vessels and machinery only; merely the same profession now covered by the curriculum of a single school and encompassed by a single diploma. There is no real barrier to the achievement of modern methods in our tape-ridden navy-yards.

PRACTICABILITY OF CONSOLIDATION.

Having examined the various conditions in detail we are now prepared to perceive the economic necessities of combination as may be classified under the following subheads:

1. The economical outlay, arrangement, and first cost of the plant.
2. The economical power operation of the plant.
3. The economical administration of industrial labor.
4. The economical purchase and handling of materials.

That is the sum total of the navy-yard needs, and there are no obstacles so far as the rearrangement of personnel is concerned. As with shops and workmen, a surplus of superintending officials may be dispensed with. The workmen may be combined with facility, as with clerks and draftsmen, creating a surplus all along the line. Also, every shop in the plant may be combined into a single one of each class or kind, excepting storehouses occupying several buildings.

THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Efficient navy-yard industry having been provided for in the foregoing, we are now prepared to consider the Navy Department itself. Whatever is best for navy-yard administration is best for the Navy Department, since the real battle ground on which the funds are expended is the navy-yard which determines the economy and efficiency of expenditures. The Navy Department is only a reflection on paper of what navy-yards and shipyards do; it only obtains the lump sums for expenditures, giving general plans and directions, and criticises results effected elsewhere.

The readjustment and consolidation of bureaus is necessary, aside from any features connected with the military administrative needs of the Navy Department which might seem to warrant such a body as a General Staff.

* * * * * * *

An executive board, of any composition, would be an unnecessary encumbrance in the Navy Department. But if the Secretary should see fit to create an advisory naval board, he could constitute it by a simple order. The best logic in the creation of the general board appears to have been in the purpose of supplying our then newly created Admiral with an office and duties commensurate with his distinguished services. That object might be attained oven better by appointing him president of the Navy board as above outlined.

The only legislation needed is the following:

1. An act abolishing the Bureaus of Yards and Docks, Steam Engineering, and Equipment, and creating the Bureau of Personnel in the Navy Department.

2. An act creating the office of assistant chief of bureau in each of the bureaus.

With an assistant chief of bureau—already long needed, there being one already in fact, if not in name—the bureau chiefs would have more time to devote to the operations of the Navy board. This board would be merely advisory and dependent, as the present boards in the Navy Department are.

Let it be well understood, however, that a Navy board is not in any way essential to the industrial efficiency of the Navy Department. I merely suggest, not advise, its creation. It may be valuable, to avoid friction and duplication of work inside the Navy Department and to provide an advisory board covering the whole field of military and industrial operations, which neither of the two boards it replaces fully cover, but it can not in anywise influence industrial administration, excepting in so far as it may facilitate the preparation of the general plans and specifications of vessels. Even then it can influence only the time, but not materially the cost, of providing new ships.

* * * * * * *

Civil engineers may be attached to naval stations belonging to the Bureau of Navigation, or to the staffs of commandants, or to navy-yards on duty for the Bureau of Construction and Repairs, as their services may be required. Line officers performing engineering duty only may be utilized at inspection duty on shore in an independent capacity in keeping with their rank and eminent abilities. It is immaterial whether they serve a different bureau.

Line officers in general, during their periods of shore duty, may be assigned to inspection and other duties under the technical bureaus.

At private shipyards, line officers may be assigned as inspectors where needed, having separate specified duties.

When the necessary legislation shall have been passed, the Secretary of the Navy shall have the authority to distribute the work among the bureaus, by which the above arrangements may be realized. When that is done, navy-yards will be able to build and repair vessels as cheaply and as efficiently as private shipyards, steadily year after year. The industrial administration may hope for the same measure of success in the future as has ever attended the efforts of the military administrator in the past.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I now yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD].

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, men go to sea for pleasure, for health, for profit in commerce, or for glory in war. Of the last I would speak here to-day, and of battles on the ocean which have been decisive in the fate of nations, especially of our own America.

From far-off centuries, 3,000 years ago, came the rumors of naval strife. From Longfellow, writing of these far-off years, in rhyme, we hear:

And shapes more shadowy than these in the dim twilight half revealed
Phœnician galleys on the seas, and Roman camps like hives of bees;
The Goth uplifting from his knees Pelayho on his shield.

It was by means of these "galleys on the seas" that Phœnicia at that time maintained her supremacy among nations.

SALAMIS.

Five centuries later we hear of a great battle on the sea. It is no vague rumor now, for every trifling and interesting detail has been handed down to us by the Greek historians. It is the battle of Salamis, one of the most decisive in the world's history. civilization against barbarism; Greek against the Persian; Themistocles against Xerxes; 380 triremes of the Greeks against 700 triremes of the Persians.

It is told us that in the conference of Greek commanders the night before, when most of them advised against joining battle with the almost overwhelming force of the Persian fleet, Themistocles almost alone urged the attack. Themistocles was taunted by Adimantus with having no city to represent, alluding to the fall of Athens. Themistocles turned quickly upon him and informed him that 200 seagoing ships well equipped and well manned were a city in themselves. In the battle next day the victory was with the Greeks. The barbarian overwhelmed, Athens and Greece saved, Themistocles had in fact a city and a country, and a world's crisis was decided that day upon the sea.

ACTIUM.

Four hundred and fifty years later, 31 B. C., another decisive battle, the battle of Actium; not Greek meeting Greek, but Roman against Roman; the fleet of Octavius against that of Mark Antony and his ally, Cleopatra. All the world looked on and saw Mark Antony's defeat, the end of his high career, brought on by his illicit love for the Egyptian queen, and costing 300 ships and the lives of 5,000 men.

LEPANTO.

Sixteen centuries later, 1571, came Lepanto, another of the world's famous battles. The mighty fleet of Spain and Venice, representing Christian civilization of that age, against the fleets of the infidel Moors and Turks. Nearly even in strength, the 600 ships and the 200,000 men closed in death-grapple. Savagely they fought, the Christian against the infidel, until the Turkish fleet was almost annihilated, only 40 of their 300 ships escaping. The Christian world rejoiced, and Don Juan of Austria, the commander of the Christian fleet, was the idol of all Europe, and his victory was a glorious event in Spanish history.

ARMADA.

A few years later, 1588, came the defeat of the Great Armada, which marked the decline of Spain's glory, then the greatest world power. Intending to overwhelm England, it was itself overwhelmed by the English fleet under those famous leaders, Admirals Howard, Sir Francis Drake, and Sir John Hawkins. From this time forward England has been the great sea power, and up to 1812 nearly always victorious, seldom defeated.

NILE.

Their greatest battle, on which their fame rests, was the Nile, in 1798, a crushing defeat for Napoleon on the sea, such as was Waterloo on land. This battle made a hero of Lord Nelson—almost worshiped by every loyal Briton.

TRAFALGAR.

A few years later followed Trafalgar, 1805, when the English fleet, under Lord Nelson, again won a glorious victory. It was a costly victory, for even as they cheered in triumph all England shed tears at the death of their idolized leader—Nelson. Nelson's signal as they closed in battle that day—"England expects every man to do his duty"—has ever since been a watchword in the English navy. This stanza comes down to us from an old song of Nelson and Trafalgar:

We beat them; how, you know, boys;
Yet many an eye was dim,
And when we talked of triumph
We only thought of him.
And still, though fifty years, boys,
Have gone, who, without pride,
Names his name, tells his fame,
Who at Trafalgar died?

Of Trafalgar Allison said:

At Waterloo England fought for victory; at Trafalgar for existence.

ENGLISH POWER SUPREME.

For two hundred years preceding 1812 England had been the mistress of the seas. Two hundred battles they claimed, with only five defeats. One of these five, however, was most humiliating to their pride. It was the battle of the Bonhomme Richard and the Serapis, September 23, 1779. It came in the dark days of our American Revolution and cheered the hearts of our patriotic ancestors as it has the hearts of every generation of Americans up to to-day, when our hearts swell with pride in John Paul Jones, the father and hero of our American Navy. In his poor old ship, the Bonhomme Richard, a merchantman improvised as a ship of war, he was opposed to one of the finest ships of the English navy, the Serapis. He had no easy task, for he fought with one of the best captains of the English navy, with a full and perfectly disciplined crew. Captain Pearson, of the Serapis, was knighted for the gallant fight he made. Paul Jones, hearing of it, laughingly said:

He deserved it, and if I can but meet him again I will make him an earl.

Who of us that heard it will ever forget the beautiful tribute paid over the remains and to the fame of this naval hero by Gen. Horace Porter at Annapolis:

Untitled knight of the blue waters, "wrathful Achilles of the ocean," conqueror of the conquerors of the sea, the recollection of your deeds will never cease to thrill men with the splendor of events and inspire them with the majesty of achievement. You honored the generation in which you lived and future ages will be illumined by the brightness of your glory.

REVOLUTIONARY STATISTICS.

While this battle was the brightest of our naval achievements in the Revolutionary war, it was not all, by any means.

At the time of the signing of the Declaration of Independence we had twenty-five vessels, only six of them built for war purposes, all the others being improvised from merchantmen. On them there were 422 guns.

Of the great English navy there were on our coast at that time seventy-eight men of war, carrying 2,078 guns.

Notwithstanding our greatly inferior force, the result was astonishing, for at the close of this war it was found that the enemy captured or destroyed 24 of our ships, carrying 477 guns, while we had captured or destroyed 102 English ships, carrying 2,622 guns, and, all told, we captured 800 of their merchantmen and ships of war, with 12,000 prisoners. Many of the merchantmen and transports captured were loaded with supplies and munitions of war for the British army, which were just what General Washington most needed, and gave strength and comfort to his Army.

An eminent authority tells us that out of the twenty most decisive naval battles in the world's history eight of them were victories for the United States Navy.

WAR OF 1812.

After magnificent naval service in the war with Tripoli and the Barbary States we come to the second of these important battles. It was in the war of 1812, when the United States was forced by England to fight for independence on the sea, just as they had forced us to fight for independence on land in the war of the Revolution. It was the first of many victories, for in that war of 1812, out of eighteen battles, our Navy triumphed in fifteen of them.

CONSTITUTION AND GUERRIERE, AUGUST 19, 1812.

The Constitution, by defeating the Guerriere, one of the finest ships in the English navy, taught them a lesson they were not soon to forget. Far from land, alone on the ocean, they fought it out, ship against ship, man to man, and all England, astonished, woke up to the fact that the despised Americans could fight, and could win as well.

CONSTITUTION'S GLORIOUS RECORD.

Three times in that war did the Constitution—or "Old Ironsides," as she was affectionately named by the American people—alone join battle with the enemy, and each time was victorious; first with the Guerriere; second, the Java, and, third, two ships at once—the Cyanne and the Levant. No wonder that this grand old ship is still kept, and will be kept for years to come, as a treasured thing, and her memory revered.

LAKE ERIE.

The third victory counted decisive in our national history took place on Lake Erie. Commander Perry's modest message of victory to President Harrison will never be forgotten in American history:

We have met the enemy and they are ours—two ships, two brigs, one schooner, and one sloop.

At the beginning of this war of 1812, so glorious in our naval achievement, it seemed in the beginning a hopeless task. A leading newspaper in England, the London Statesman, under date of June 10, 1812, in an editorial said:

America certainly can not pretend to wage war with us; she has no navy to do it with.

There was reason for that statement, for we had then but 17 ships, carrying 442 guns, and 5,025 men, while our powerful adversary, England, then in the zenith of her naval power, swelled with pride over her recent victories of the Nile and Trafalgar, had 1,048 ships, carrying 27,800 guns, and 151,572 men. And what a result! We conquered them in fifteen out of eighteen battles, captured over 20,000 prisoners, and took or destroyed 1,500 ships, annihilating their commerce.

MONITOR AND MERRIMAC.

The fourth decisive battle came nearly fifty years later, in the war of the rebellion. The little Monitor against the formidable Merrimac—a David against a Goliath. By the genius of the inventor, Ericsson, the skill of the commander, Worden, and the efficiency of her crew, the Monitor defeated her huge antagonist, and the hope of the Confederacy was crushed.

As a boy of 10, I well remember the thrilling story that came to us in Massachusetts from that fight in Hampton Roads and the "cheese box on a raft," as the Monitor was admiringly called, and the United States Navy were the pride of all loyal American hearts.

MOBILE BAY.

The fifth decisive battle was that of Mobile Bay, which gave Admiral Farragut the mark of fame, and his order, "Damn the torpedoes, go ahead!" is an example of his terse and vigorous use of the Queen's English. It was Farragut who said:

Give me iron in the men and I shall not much mind the iron in the ships.

KEARSARGE AND ALABAMA.

The sixth decisive battle was that of the Kearsarge over the Alabama June 12, 1864. As a boy and an eye witness, I well remember the ovation given the Kearsarge as she entered Boston Harbor, the first home port made by the ship after the battle, and the next day a schoolboy of 12 in the gallery of Faneuil Hall, called the "Cradle of liberty," I witnessed the banqueting of the gallant crew. Every one of them was 10 feet tall at least in the admiring eyes of we boys.

MANILA AND SANTIAGO.

Seventh and eighth in the list of decisive battles are those of recent date, now ten years ago—Manila and Santiago. They have added new glory to our naval achievements. It thrills our hearts as we recall at Santiago the grand race of the Oregon along the Cuban coast, the white foam rolling high in billows from her bows, the black smoke rolling in dense volume back from her huge funnels—a giant bulldog of the sea. And then the last Spanish ship driven upon the beach, all fighting over, what tenderness did our victorious seamen show for the conquered Spaniards. In his report to the Admiral, Captain Evans said:

I can not express my admiration for my magnificent crew. So long as the enemy showed his flag they fought like American seamen, but when the flag came down they were as gentle and tender as American women.

[Applause.]

All the world admired as they read how, as the excited men on the good battle ship Texas began to cheer for victory, their captain, Phillip, said:

Do not cheer, boys; the poor fellows are dying over there.

How true the old line, "The bravest are the tenderest." [Applause.]

By the thunder of Dewey's guns at Manila and of our fleet at Santiago a new glory has come to our country. With one bound from a nation of ordinary rank, we have leaped to the front rank of the world powers—no nation on earth more respected than our own. We have never known a decisive defeat on the ocean, but in every decisive battle have been victorious.

All honor to our American Navy and to the glorious record of the United States upon the seas. [Applause.]

I wish we might take a lesson from the history of the Navy of our country. We were not prepared for war at the time of the Revolution. We were not prepared for war upon the sea in the war of 1812, but with stout hearts we won our battles. The God of Battles was with us. But in those days a fleet could be built in months, and now it would be a matter of years.

In our last war with Spain we had a pitifully small navy—five battle ships, two armored cruisers, and thirteen protected cruisers. But what we did have was so well handled that it inured to the glory of our country. We can not always, if engaged in war, be engaged with a country like Spain. If we have a war—and I hope we may never have another one—it may be with some of the stronger nations of the earth, and it behooves us to be ready for anything that may come.

I can not subscribe to the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] when he says that he believes the nation is on the apex of a volcano, ready to be blown out of existence if we do not have 100 battle ships. Neither can I subscribe to the doctrine of peace advocated by the gentleman from Missouri, whereby we shall do away with all battle ships and all navies as a business proposition. Since this country came into existence we have been engaged in war six different times—on an average once in twenty-five years, and on the law of chances I can not predict otherwise than that by some decree of fate, we know not how or when, we will again be embroiled with some other nation of the earth, and it is living in a fool's paradise to say that because we have peace to-day there never again will be war.

If we need a navy, we need a strong navy. We need a strong navy, or else we need none. And if we are committed to a navy, as we are to-day, it is a question of how strong a navy we should have.

We men each have our own ideas upon that. My belief is that we should have a navy second in strength to any nation in the world. By that I do not mean that we should equal England, which is the strongest naval power, but that we should have a navy stronger than the next power. At present that nation is France. My figures show that England has to-day eighty-four battle ships and armored cruisers built and ten building, or a total of ninety-four, with a tonnage of 1,208,000 tons. France has fifty battle ships and armored cruisers built or building, with a total of 589,000 tons, considerably less than half the strength of England. The United States has built and building forty-one such ships, with a tonnage of 563,000 tons. It is my belief that we should have a navy 20 per cent, or thereabouts, stronger than any other nation except England.

Mr. GARRETT. Why except England?

Mr. LOUD. Because England has other considerations than we have. She has a great colonial organization to care for and has a great commerce to protect. I regret that we have not one also, but her merchant marine is a source of weakness in time of war.

And, again, it is argued by those who have studied the matter that England should always be prepared to meet any two nations on earth, it being considered there may be some coalition between two or more nations as against England. That is advanced as an argument for the size of her navy.

Mr. GARRETT. England has usually been equal to the expectation by making a coalition with one or two others herself, has she not?

Mr. LOUD. I think so.

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. Is it not true that, so far as England is concerned, in Canada we have a sort of hostage for her good behavior?

Mr. LOUD. I am not looking for any trouble with England, and I may say at this time that I am not looking for any trouble with Japan. I was in Japan a short time ago, and if I am a judge of any people I ever visited, there is no people that would be more glad to be friends with another nation than Japan would be to be friends with the United States, and only some act of ours can ever force war between the United States and Japan. Every interest of Japan is for peace with us.

At the present time their financial condition is not such as would warrant their embarking in any war. It would be the last subject they would contemplate, and then besides we are the greatest consumer of her exports. We would be the last nation that she would undertake to engage in war with if it were left to any volition of hers, and her people feel most friendly to us and have for fifty-five years, since Perry landed there in 1853 and made the first commercial treaty with Japan.

Next we come to the question of how many ships we ought to authorize this year. I would subscribe, if I could, to what I believe to be a consistent business programme, and that is that we should build two battle ships each year for the next ten years or more. In this country, however, one Congress can not by its action bind a succeeding Congress to any such programme. In sentiment I am for a large and a strong Navy, and because we have no guaranty what other Congresses will do I shall vote at this time, if I have the opportunity, for four battle ships, although I would far rather, if I could see a systematic policy inaugurated, vote for two each year for ten years.

There is one subject which is of great interest to me, and that is the subject of colliers for our fleet. When I was at Hampton Roads on the 16th of December, watching that grand fleet of ours sail out of Chesapeake Bay——

Mr. GILL. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. GILL. The gentleman is speaking with some interest about colliers. I would like to ask the gentleman if he can explain or if he understands why it is that the Secretary put out of commission two colliers in San Francisco for the purpose of putting in commission one hospital ship, if the navy needs colliers?

Mr. LOUD. As I do not know that he has done so I will have to refer the gentleman to the Secretary of the Navy. I can not answer that question, but I will state that I would put out of commission, if I had my way, three-quarters of all the colliers now owned by the United States Navy, for the reason that they are so small in capacity that no business man in the United States who was carrying coal for profit would dare to use such small vessels for carrying coal as a business proposition. Still, because they are handed down to us from the Spanish-American war, and we have no others, we are using them.

Mr. GILL. I understand the Government bought those because of necessity. They bought the colliers that the gentleman refers to during the Spanish war?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly. As that fleet of ours steamed out into the Atlantic from Hampton Roads there was not with them a single collier. No provision had been made for the transportation of coal to go with the fleet. In order to have the fuel for making that long trip around to San Francisco they have been forced to send colliers ahead at the different ports along the route, and that coal, except what little was carried in Government colliers, was carried, with one exception, in foreign bottoms.

In case of war we could only wonder what condition we would be in, with a great fleet of battle ships without a single suitable collier to carry the coal for the fleet. When I say a "suitable collier" I mean a different collier from anything which we possess to-day. We are building now two colliers, one at the Mare Island Navy-Yard and one in the New York Navy-Yard. Each one of those colliers are to carry 6,000 tons of coal and are to have a speed of 16 knots per hour. Anyone who knows anything about boats realizes fully what it costs to get this great speed of 16 knots per hour. It doubles the cost of the ship, increases the size of it, the number of boilers required, more powerful machinery, and all that. I believe when we build colliers of that speed we should at least get a collier capable of carrying from ten to twelve thousand tons of coal each trip. Upon the Great Lakes, as a business proposition, that subject has been thrashed out again and again, and the five and six thousand ton collier has gone to the rear.

Now, the men who are prospering in business upon the Great Lakes in the carrying trade must build boats to carry ten to twelve thousand tons, and if you stand upon the banks of the Detroit River at Detroit you will see, hour after hour, a procession of great steel vessels passing up and down, and all the latest ones built to carry from ten to twelve thousand tons of coal or iron ore. They have been demonstrated to be the most profitable boats to carry cargoes for the least cost, and so it seems to me that if we are to build colliers we ought to build them of adequate size in which coal can be carried at a reasonable cost.

Mr. ADAIR. I would just like to ask the gentleman a question——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAIR. How was the coal carried during the Spanish-American war? You say we did not have colliers sufficient.

Mr. LOUD. We hunted the world over, and bought every old thing we could buy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FOSS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TIRRELL].

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Chairman, yesterday afternoon the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] made a speech upon the paper and pulp industry of the United States, during which—unwittingly, no doubt, because our relations are of the most intimate and friendly character—he made some aspersions upon myself. For this reason I desire to correct some misstatements in his speech, because I believe they ought not to stand upon the record uncontradicted by the facts. I make this statement not in the interest of any company, because I have no interest in them; nor because I desire to shield any company from any prosecution, because I believe that any company, no matter whether in the paper business or in any other industry in the United States which by combination of interests have violated the law and are endeavoring to control prices ought to be punished to the fullest extent that the law authorizes. The first misstatement which was made was in his opening remarks about the immense amount of wood which was consumed by the company which he was attacking, the International Paper Company, wherein he said:

Which certainly has been a large consumer of our diminishing stock of wood.

The fact is that this company consumed just 1.6 per cent of the wood which is cut in the United States. The next misstatement made is in regard to our tariff on pulp and paper. I am astonished that so intelligent and so well-read a gentleman should spread before the country the statement which he yesterday made. He said:

The first thing that was done prior to the organization of the International Paper Company was to raise the duty. The duty on print paper at that time was $3, which was more than sufficient, but with a prudent regard for future development, the duty, which was already prohibitory, of $3 was raised to $6.

The gentleman did not seem to know the theory upon which our tariff was formulated and the tariffs before it. The Wilson tariff was formulated upon an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent, and our friend from New York has arrived at this duty by figuring 15 per cent on 2-cent paper, which would amount to three-tenths of a cent per pound, and he has arrived at $3 a ton by multiplying 15 per cent by two, whereas this being three-tenths of a cent per pound multiplied by the ton would amount to $6, which is the correct statement in regard to the case. Now, the Dingley tariff was formulated on a specific-duty basis, and that specific duty in regard to the tariff upon paper was just the same as the Wilson tariff, so that if you multiply in the same way you did before, you have the same duty which you had previous to its enactment, the same duty, substantially, a Democratic Congress placed upon that product.

That shows the fallacy of that statement in regard to the tariff duty.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is, you get the same result under each bill?

Mr. TIRRELL. You get the same result under each bill, and therefore neither the International Paper Company nor any other paper company in this country can be shown as coming before Congress in order to raise the duty in order to carry on their business or organize their company.

The next misstatement is in regard to the value of paper plants. He says in his remarks that there were some of the companies taken in by the International Paper Company that were worth a good deal and that a good many were worth nothing, and the capitalization was produced by erroneous valuation of the plants, which should have been estimated at their capital value only. He cites one paper-mill company with a capital of $500,000 where securities were issued by the International Paper Company to the amount of $2,250,000. Now, the fact in regard to the building of paper mills is that there is no paper mill in this country that can be built to-day, according to the estimates of experts, at less than $30,000 a ton of paper produced, and as the International Paper Company produces 1,700 tons of paper a day, if you multiply it by what experts say you have a valuation of $51,000,000, which is about the total valuation of this company to which I have referred, common stock and all.

You might just as well say that these companies which were capitalized thirty, or forty, or fifty years ago, many of them, and which have been adding to their plants, increasing them, doubling them, tripling them, buying wood lots, and so forth, with the same capitalization, are worth no more than they were when the capitalization was first formed. Take the Chemical National Bank of New York, the par value of whose stock is $100, and that same stock is sold for about $1,500, and there would be just as much consistency in the gentleman saying the Chemical National Bank stock was worth only $100 as to say that these paper companies, which have been multiplying their resources all these years, are only worth what they were originally capitalized at forty or fifty years ago. Now, there is one asset alone which this company possesses which is worth as much as the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] said the entire plant was worth. The horsepower which has been developed by this company is 150,000, and there is no engineer of experience in this country who will tell you that you can on the average develop horsepower upon rivers or anywhere else at less than $100 for each horsepower, and if you will multiply by the entire horsepower you will find that the capitalization value of these companies, the value of this company in its horsepower alone, is worth as much as he says the entire plant of the twenty-four companies which they absorbed.

The next misrepresentation which the gentleman made was in regard to the dividends which this company had paid upon its common stock. He said in his speech that it was perfectly possible to sell stock to an eager public if it paid dividends on its common stock at the rate of 4 per cent covering a period of two years. As a matter of fact, it paid 1 per cent in July, 1898, and 1 per cent in October, 1898, and that is all it has ever paid upon that common stock.

The next misstatement the gentleman makes is in regard to the salary which is paid to its president. He says that they were exercising economy, and then sarcastically added:

It is stated that the salary of the president of the new corporation was fixed at $50,000—a very favorite form of economy.

As a matter of fact, the salary of the president of this company is, and has been, $25,000 a year, not an excessive sum in view of the enormous business and great responsibilities which devolve upon him. I wish also to add in this connection, in order to cover this subject, what is said in an article which I will read in regard to the organization of other paper companies throughout this country. Now, the Great Northern Company of Maine is the largest paper manufacturing concern in the United States outside of the International, and probably in the——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. TIRRELL. I would like just one minute.

Mr. FOSS. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. TIRRELL. Now, this company produces 300 tons, or did produce at the time this statement was made, 300 tons of paper a day. It had cost that company, with the benefit of all experience in constructing paper mills in past years, $9,000,000, and they built it cheap. Now, then, if they produced with a capital of $9,000,000—or, rather, with an expenditure of $9,000,000 on their plant—300 tons a day, and the International Paper Company produces 1,700 tons a day, or more than five times as much, if you will multiply the figures, you will find that five times $9,000,000 would be $45,000,000; and then you have got a surplus to work on which would bring up the cost of the plant of the International Paper Company to duplicate to-day to $50,000,000. I wish these remarks, Mr. Chairman, to be placed upon the RECORD in order that the paper manufacturers of the country may have the facts just as they are and receive a square deal, if it comes to action, that I believe they will receive from the Congress of the United States.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a short time ago the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] arose in his place and delivered a speech in this House because, to use his own language, he could no longer possess his soul in patience while gentlemen lost sight of the qualities of exalted American statesmanship and descended to the plane of the politician to claim a credit they did not deserve.

The direct and immediate cause of his great anguish of soul, as disclosed by his speech, was the fact that Democrats refused to accord unstinted praise to Republican administration, and were wicked enough to try to deprive the Republican party of the credit the gentleman seems to think that party is entitled to with reference to railroad rate and antitrust legislation and the enforcement thereof.

In the brief time now allotted to me I desire to call attention to a few well-authenticated facts, so that the Members of this House and the country may judge therefrom for themselves whether the past record of the party to which the gentleman belongs is altogether worthy of the encomiums he has pronounced upon it, and who it is, if any one, that "has lost sight of the qualities of exalted American statesmanship and descended to the plane of the politician."

The gentleman claims that the regulation of railroads by Congress is of Republican origin and of Republican legislation, and to prove this contention he refers to bills and resolutions by various individual Republicans introduced from time to time, beginning in 1865 and running up to 1887, when the Cullom bill was passed. Mr. Chairman, I shall not take time at present, as I do not deem it necessary, to inquire just what these bills and resolutions were, or whether or not any individual Democrats, during this period, were concerned with railroad regulation. But I do want to say that although such bills and resolutions as mentioned by the gentleman from Michigan may have been introduced by Republican Congressmen the fact remains that the Republican party refused to enact any of them into law, although it was in full and complete control of the Government nearly all of that time.

Let us examine the record. At two different times during that period Congressional committees made investigation of railroad abuses and reported their findings to Congress. The Windom report, in 1873, was very exhaustive and evinced a very thorough investigation. It declared that there existed very gross defects and abuses in the then existing system of transportation, which consisted of insufficient facilities, unfair discrimination, and extortionate charges, and as the principal causes of such extortionate rates this report assigned stock watering, capitalization of surplus earnings, construction rings, general extravagance and corruption in railway management, and combinations and consolidations of railway companies. This committee, after reaching these conclusions, went further and expressed the opinion that the promotion of competition would not permanently remedy the evil for the reason that, as a general rule, competition among railroads ends in combination and in enhanced rates; and therefore the committee recommended Congressional regulation under the power to regulate commerce among the several States as the only effective remedy.

According to the gentleman from Michigan himself, petitions from the people poured into Congress from every direction praying for relief. So that the gentleman is very unfortunate in the evidence which he brings forward in favor of his party. He proves too much. He proves that individual Members of Congress during the period mentioned introduced bills repeatedly for the regulation of railroads; that committees appointed for that purpose thoroughly investigated and reported upon the evils, abuses, and extortion of railway practices and suggested remedies, and that the people sent up petitions from every direction. But he also shows that his party, which was in power, utterly disregarded all these things and took no steps to give the people relief.

Mr. Chairman, the truth is the first real move toward the regulation of interstate commerce was the introduction of a bill in the House of Representatives in 1878 by a Democrat, the Hon. John H. Reagan, the grand old Commoner from Texas. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This statement, I believe, is confirmed by all the authorities except the gentleman from Michigan. The Reagan bill was a comprehensive and well-planned measure, and the RECORD will show that he pressed it vigorously upon the attention of Congress until he secured its passage in 1887 by a Democratic House of Representatives during the first Democratic Administration since the war. [Renewed applause on the Democratic side.]

But the gentleman from Michigan belittles the Reagan bill, because it did not create a Commission, notwithstanding it provided that its provisions should be enforceable in both the State and Federal courts. He contends that the omission of the Commission feature takes Judge Reagan entirely from the list of those who can claim to be pioneers in the movement for railway regulation, although he mentions with praise the most trivial bills on the subject introduced by Republicans. In doing this, of course, he keeps constantly in sight "the qualities of exalted American statesmanship."

The reason the Reagan bill did not become a law was because the Senate was Republican. That body passed the Cullom bill instead, which, as a compromise, was accepted by the House and became a law. The Cullom bill provided for a Commission, and this fact is mentioned by the gentleman from Michigan with evident pride.

Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt every Democrat upon this floor is willing to accord to the Republican party all the glory it claims for having put the Commission feature into the Cullom law, because it must also claim the glory (?) of omitting to confer upon that Commission any power. You were so afraid of interfering with the business of the railroads that you merely set up a dummy, with practically no power except to receive its salary. This the Supreme Court made plain to the people by a decision which it rendered in 1897, and from that time until this the Republican party has had full and complete control of every department of the Government, and could at any time have passed an effective law.

But what have been the facts? Immediately after the decision was rendered to which I have referred by which the people were advised that they were still at the mercy of the railroads, organizations of farmers, of merchants, of manufacturers, and of other shippers began to pass resolutions and to send up to Congress petitions asking that the Cullom law be amended. They wanted to have some substantial power conferred upon the Commission. The Commission itself from year to year in its reports called attention of Congress to its absolute want of power and its helplessness to afford any protection to the people. In addition to this, the Democratic party, in national convention in 1896, 1900, and 1904, in specific and emphatic terms demanded such legislation. The press of the country advocated it. Bill after bill was introduced in Congress by both Democratic and Republican Members favoring it.

Notwithstanding all this, what did your party do? Absolutely nothing. For nearly ten years it completely ignored the question. Its platforms, the party creed, made no reference to it, and as a party you remained absolutely indifferent, during all of which time the people suffered the grossest abuses, extortions, and oppressions at the hands of unbridled railroad monopoly. You folded your hands complacently and, with a criminal disregard of your duty and obligation to the public and without sympathy or compassion, you witnessed the robbery and oppression of those to whom it was your duty to afford protection.

Did I say you did nothing? I think I should modify that. There was one feature of the Cullom law which was good, and that was the provision for a penalty of imprisonment against rebates and discriminations. This penalty you concluded was too severe upon the poor railroads, so in 1903 you repealed the imprisonment part of the penalty and fixed it so that whenever the courts should find a railroad guilty of rebating, they could impose only a pecuniary fine, which the railroads could collect back from the people.

Mr. Chairman, this favorable attitude of the Republican party toward railway abuses continued without interruption until 1906, when the so-called "Hepburn bill" was passed, and, as I shall presently show, did not wholly disappear then. However, before I undertake to point out the inadequacy of the Hepburn law, I want to call attention to the fact which every observer of the legislative history of the times already knows, and that is, the Republicans in Congress continually refused to take up the railroad question with any serious intention of further legislation until they had lost the support of the President in their do-nothing policy and could no longer resist the just demands of an outraged people. As long as your party platform was silent upon the question and your President ignored it, you had the courage to withstand the entreaties and importunities of the people; but when Mr. Roosevelt broke away from you and said the Democrats were right, that the powers of the Commission ought to be enlarged, it was such an admission against interest you were forced to a realization of the fact that you had to heed or go out of power, and the Hepburn law was the result.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I am sorry I can not yield; I have only a limited time. If any gentleman on the other side wants to deny what I have said, let him explain to the country why the Republican party for nearly ten years viewed with such complacency every abuse in the management and operation of the railroads of the country that cunning, greed, and avarice could devise and never raised its hand nor uttered a protest.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Republican party having been forced, in the manner I have stated, to take some action, let us see to what extent it has gone toward meeting the needs of the people. The Hepburn law was passed. For the want of a better bill it received the support of the Democrats. This law has a number of good features, but very serious defects. The Republicans were still so afraid they would do the railroads an injustice that they again left them free to fix their own rates and conferred upon the Commission the very smallest power of supervision over rates they could possibly find words to express. They do not permit the Commission to investigate and adjust a single rate upon its own initiative. Every person who is made the victim of railway extortion is required to go before the Commission with formal complaint, and at his own expense contest with these giant corporations backed by their able and expert counsel and millions of money. Such a contest is so unequal and expensive that the citizen, as a general rule, will prefer to suffer the abuses to which he may be subjected rather than to undertake it.

Mr. Chairman, no one will contend for a moment that there is any competition in rates among the railroads. We all know that the rates charged for transportation are never the subject of negotiation and contract, but are determined by the will of the carrier and enforced upon the shippers. And who ultimately pays transportation charges? The great mass of consumers of the country. Those by whom such charges are primarily paid are, of course, the shippers or middlemen, who ordinarily do not concern themselves as to the amount so long as they are not discriminated against in favor of a competitor in business. No matter how extortionate and unjust rates may be they shift them to the backs of the consumers, who have no right of complaint and no mode of redress.

And, sirs, there is no expense so pervasive and universal as the cost of transportation. It constitutes an important part of the cost of every article employed for the sustenance, comfort, and gratification of man. It is a tax upon every article we use in our daily living, and the amount of it is fixed and forced from us by irresponsible railway officials with no restraint except such as is imposed by that natural law which determines "what the traffic will bear."

To illustrate the importance to the people of every change in rates I call attention to the fact that the gross earnings of the railroads of this country for the year 1907 was the enormous sum of $2,585,913,000. An advance in rates of 1 per cent would have taken from the pockets of the people an additional amount of $25,859,130; an advance of 5 per cent would have taken from them $129,295,650 additional, and a 10 per cent advance would have increased their burden $258,591,300.

Such power for extorting money from the people, in my humble judgment, should never be, by a free and liberty-loving people, allowed to remain in the hands of private corporations or individuals, however fair-minded they may be.

Do you contend that the railroads do not abuse this extraordinary power? I only have to call your attention to the fact that since the Hepburn law went into effect there has been a material advance in rates, and the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission for 1907 shows that millions have been taken from the people by the railroads in excess of what I believe they were entitled to. That report shows that the railroads of the United States that year, after paying from their net income interest, rents, betterments, taxes, and miscellaneous items and dividends, had left a surplus of $132,200,140. The Commission advises me that the term "betterments," as used in this report, means permanent improvements to existing structures which increases their value, but I have been unable to obtain a statement as to the amount which was put into betterments out of the income account of the railroads for the year 1907. For the year 1906 the amount was about $50,000,000. Assuming that the amount for 1907 was no more, it is shown that the railroads took from the people that year over $182,000,000 more than was necessary to pay all legitimate items.

Mr. Chairman, I deny the right of the railroad corporations of this country to levy a tax upon the people for money with which to make permanent improvements, which add to the value of their property, and in addition thereto produce a surplus to further enhance the value of their stocks.

I contend that railroads are entitled to a fair and reasonable return upon the value of their property and no more. This much is guaranteed to them by the Constitution and can not be taken from them by any legislative or administrative power of this Government. Subject to this constitutional restriction the power of Congress to regulate interstate rates is supreme, and I submit that it ought to be exercised for the protection of the helpless millions in this country against extortion. If the gentlemen on the other side insist upon claiming credit for all our railway legislation, they must also assume responsibility for its defects and shortcomings. Neither the present law nor any former law gives the people any protection against extortion in railway rates. It seems to have always been the policy of the Republican party to give to the question of rebates and discriminations what little attention they give the railroad problem at all. Extortion has been completely overlooked. It has been all right for the railroads to rob the people provided one railroad did not rob more than another.

Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, there is but one remedy, and that is to give the Commission the power to fix rates. Clothe that body with the authority and cast upon it the duty to act upon its own initiative. The Supreme Court has declared that a railroad corporation is created for public purposes and that it performs a function of the State. If this be true then the State has the right to regulate and control the functions which railroad corporations exercise. Many of the States have already conferred this broad power upon their commissions, and such power is now being constantly exercised in fairness and justice to the railroads and for the protection of the people. The same power ought to be conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to be exercised over interstate commerce. You have the power. Will you do it? I proposed it in an amendment to the Hepburn bill, but it was voted down. I propose it in a bill now pending before this Congress. President Roosevelt recommends it substantially in his recent message. Now, it is for you to answer whether or not you will grant such power to the Commission. I presume it is vain for me to hope that you will, for it has never been the policy of your party to place any obstacle in the way of private monopoly or to protect the people from insatiate greed and avarice.

CAR SERVICE.

Mr. Chairman, there is another phase of the railroad question that has been neglected. Certain business interests of this country are suffering great injury, some of them almost complete destruction, because the railroads neglect to furnish cars and to move freight with proper diligence and dispatch.

It is the duty of the railroads to furnish cars to shippers and transport freight without unreasonable delay, but in some parts of the country they are not doing so. They not only charge what they please for the service, but they perform the service in the manner best suited to their own convenience and mainly in the interest of stockholders. They ought to be compelled to recognize their obligation to the public, and to this end adequate penalties ought to be provided. In the last Congress and in this I introduced a bill to cure this evil. Witnesses have been brought here who are engaged in the live-stock business in the West, and they have appeared before both the Senate and House Committees on Interstate Commerce. These witnesses have detailed before these committees a state of affairs resulting from this willful neglect of duty on the part of the railroads sufficient not only to shock our sense of justice, but to excite our deepest sympathy and commiseration.

We seek to impose no new or impossible or unreasonable duty upon the railroads. We only demand that they perform the duties with which they have always been charged. We want to require of them only reasonable service. We demand that they shall be required to have some regard for the rights and welfare of the public as well as for the pockets of stockholders.

Upon this question your President has again shown his courage by breaking away from you. In his special message to Congress on January 30 last he urges this legislation. What are you going to do about it? We shall await with anxiety and with as much patience as we may the action of the committees on this measure and the pleasure of those on whom rest the responsibility for the legislation of this country. You may be able to resist the influence of the President and refuse to pass this measure, but if you do I warn you now that there are hundreds of thousands of sovereign American citizens in this country whose business is being ruined by the neglect of the railroads who will hold you responsible.

Mr. Chairman, I want it understood that I have no animosity toward the railroads. I would not do them an injustice, but they should not do injustice to the people.

TRUSTS.

Mr. Chairman, I now come to the trust question. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] correctly admits that Democrats have always been opposed to the trusts; that they have in the press, on the stump, and in convention fought and condemned the trusts, yet he argues that our antitrust legislation is of Republican origin and has been the subject of Republican enforcement almost exclusively.

If the gentleman had desired to remain upon the high plane of "exalted American statesmanship"—and my respect for him is such that I have no doubt that he did—it seems to me that it would have been only fair for him to have gone further and admitted that it was through the counsel of such able constitutional lawyers as Vest in the Senate and CULBERSON in the House, both Democrats, that the Sherman antitrust bill was put into constitutional form, and that in accordance with the unvarying sentiment of the Democratic party it received the support, practically, of every Democrat in Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And, Mr. Chairman, there is another important fact which the gentleman saw fit not to mention, but which I think he ought to have mentioned, just to keep his history straight if for no other reason, and that is, that the trusts themselves are of Republican origin. [Renewed applause.] They are the outgrowth of a vicious system of government for which the Republican party alone is responsible, and which it can no longer defend.

The people of this country can not be further misled into the belief that your tariff policy has been for the just and reasonable protection of American industry and labor, for they are convinced that that policy has gone far beyond the point of such protection. They are convinced that it is what the dominant forces in the Republican party intended it should be—a veritable Chinese wall around our borders to prevent competition from abroad. They are convinced that its object and purpose was and is to aid an unscrupulous and greedy band of commercial and industrial pirates in holding up the people of this country for the purpose of extortion and plunder. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am speaking more particularly of the Dingley law, which I understand is the highest tariff law that was ever enacted by any nation in any age of the world. The conditions brought about by that law have become intolerable. Being protected from competition from abroad by the barriers which that law erects, the beneficiaries thereof have, by every scheme, device, conspiracy, and combination that greed and cunning could invent, eliminated competition at home. More trusts have been formed in this country in the last ten years under the operation of the Dingley law than in all the previous history of our Government. They have multiplied in number and grown in power until their imperious sway has been extended over almost every field of human industry, and they hold in their heartless and monopolistic grasp almost every article of necessity in daily use among the people. [Renewed applause.] They dictate prices to the producer and extort tribute from the consumer, while they dictate to labor the terms and conditions of employment. The citizen can not escape their power. As tax gatherers they stalk in multitudes by his side by day and by night, and without sympathy or compassion demand and collect a tax upon almost every purchase or sale his necessities require him to make.

Mr. Chairman, this is no fairy tale, but a hard and cruel fact, which casts its hideous and sickening shadow over millions of helpless homes in this country. And this is not all. These monopolies which you have fostered have flooded this country with their securities, which have for their basis no real property value, but have for their support only their monopolistic power to extort from the people. The returns from these securities usually being so attractive by reason of being so remunerative, many of the bankers of the country invest heavily in them the money of their depositors, and what is the result? Even a threat of prosecution against these monopolies for violation of the antitrust laws creates fear and distrust and precipitates a panic. The very system is rotten, and there seems to be no protection or relief to the people except at the cost of widespread business disaster.

You can not deny that this is the situation in this country to-day, and who is responsible for it? You may go on trying to deceive the people by discussing what was or was not done during the Cleveland Administration, but you will not succeed. They know that the Democratic party has had full control of the executive and legislative branches of this Government only two short years out of the forty-three since the war. It matters not how much you may protest, deny, or argue, they know that the trust evil has become so very acute only since the passage of the Dingley law; that hundreds of them exist to-day in aggravated form as a consequence of that law, whereas comparatively few existed before; and yet, whenever it is suggested that the Republican party has not been as active and diligent in the enforcement of the antitrust law as it should have been, some gentleman on the other side, from his high plane of "exalted American statesmanship" rises in his place and in solemn tones reminds the country that there have been a larger number of trust prosecutions during the Administration of Mr. Roosevelt than during the Administration of Mr. Cleveland. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] himself unloaded this bit of argument upon the House in the speech to which I have already referred.

Mr. Chairman, I am not here to defend the Administration of Mr. Cleveland. I shall not criticise it further than to say that because there arose in the minds of the Democratic masses a conviction that the sympathies of Mr. Cleveland, like those of the leaders of the Republican party, were with the devotees of predatory wealth, the Democratic party long ago repudiated many of his policies as the only means of deserving Democratic support and of preserving the existence of the Democratic party.

But whatever may be said in criticism of Mr. Cleveland's Administration, it is a fact that there were more trust prosecutions during his term than there were during the term of Mr. Harrison immediately preceding and more than there were during the Administration of Mr. McKinley immediately succeeding, and as many, lacking only two, as there were during both the terms of Harrison and McKinley. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman possessing the "qualities of exalted American statesmanship" to such a high degree forgot to call attention to these facts, although they were clearly embodied in a printed statement issued by the Attorney-General on December 2, 1907.

The truth is, as is shown by that statement, the Sherman antitrust law ever since its enactment has virtually been a dead letter. Harrison did not enforce it, Cleveland did not enforce it, McKinley did not enforce it, and Roosevelt has not enforced it. During Harrison's Administration there were only seven cases, four civil and three criminal. During Cleveland's Administration there were only eight cases, four civil and four criminal. During McKinley's Administration there were only three cases, all civil. And during Roosevelt's Administration, extending over a period of more than seven years, during which time hundreds of trusts existing in violation of law have daily plundered the American people, there have been only thirty-five cases, seventeen civil and eighteen criminal.

The Sherman antitrust law became effective on July 2, 1890, nearly eighteen years ago. Since that time trusts have multiplied from year to year, have driven competition from business, plundered the people, forced individual proprietors into bankruptcy, oppressed labor, debauched and corrupted our political life, and defied Congress and the courts. All this in violation of the law, for which in the eighteen years there have been instituted in the courts by our Government only fifty-three cases in all, including both civil and criminal. And the results from these cases, as shown by the Attorney-General's report, have been extremely meager. Outside of a few injunctions granted there have been only eight convictions in criminal cases, in which merely fines were imposed aggregating the sum of only $96,000, far less, I dare say, than the amount wrongfully extorted from the people by these unlawful combinations every day in the year. What would you think of only twenty or twenty-five prosecutions for theft out of thousands of violations of the law against theft. Such a thing would be absolutely ridiculous, and yet it would be no more ridiculous than the record that has been made in the matter of trust prosecutions.

Mr. Chairman, in order that the people of this country may no longer be deceived by the false claim so often made by Republicans, I shall, by permission, insert in the RECORD, as an appendix to my remarks, the statement of the Attorney-General to which I have already referred. I want the people of this country to read it, and then in connection with it I want them to read the list prepared a few years ago by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] and which was inserted in the RECORD on December 12 last by one of the Senators, containing the names of more than 400 big trusts existing in violation of law. The number, no doubt, has greatly increased since the list was prepared. Let the two documents be read together and I dare say they exhibit an example of official dereliction and political hypocrisy never surpassed in any age of the world.

Mr. Chairman, not a single individual has ever been sent to jail, and what excuse does the President give? In his message to this Congress he says jurors are quite willing to fine the corporations, but will not imprison individuals. With all due respect to the President, I must deny that such is the case, and in support of my denial I appeal to the President's own experience. I do not find any case in the Attorney-General's statement in which an individual was tried before a jury and acquitted, and I find only one criminal case against an individual submitted to a jury at all. I think I know something of the temper of the jurors of this country. The average juror will convict in any sort of a case if proven, but especially would he convict those who employ an unlawful combination of capital to plunder the public. I suppose it was because of the peculiar views which the President holds on this question that he did not prosecute the individuals who organized the Northern Securities Company, and who went ahead after the company was dissolved and, by individual combination, did, without a corporation, the identical same thing they were prevented from doing with one.

Mr. Chairman, the attitude of the Republican party with regard to the enforcement of the antitrust law is well illustrated by the President's appointment of the present Attorney-General, whose antipathy to antitrust legislation is well known. In the proceedings of the antitrust conference held at Chicago a few years ago, there appears a speech by Mr. Bonaparte, in which he made the following remarkable statement:
